Dear Ann Landers:

1,200-Mile Visit by Kiddies Ill-Advised

By ANN LANDERS

Dear Ann: Two years ago we moved out here from a city 1200 miles away. Our two teenagers hated to leave their lifelong friends. They've made some acquaintances out here, but their hearts are still back there. They've been pestering for six months to go back and spend the summer with this family who lived across the street. This week they received a written invitation from the parents. We are at a loss to know what to do. These parents are much too easy-going to suit us. They thought nothing of leaving an 11-year-old in charge of a house full of kids while they went off visiting or to the movies. The children never were fed meals, they just helped themselves all day long. Sleeping five and six to a room was considered O.K. They were always getting sick or hurt because no one watched them. When we lived across the street and our children were there, I supervised, for my own peace of mind. My husband and I have talked it over and we've decided it would be a terrible nervous strain on us if we let our children go. If we say NO, without explaining, they'll be bitterly resentful. Yet, how can we tell the youngsters our real objections? They'll never understand.—D. VAN

If your children are old enough to consider a 1200-mile trip, they are old enough to understand plain English. Tell them exactly how you feel and why. They may not be happy about it, but deep down they'll know your judgment is sound and they'll respect you. You'd be foolish to pack your children off and send them to the kind of home you describe. Teenagers should not be left in their own devices, night and day without adult supervision. It's your obligation as parents to decide what is best for your children and then stick to it. When you knuckle under and give in to their pleading, you fail them... and yourselves.

Dear Ann: I am a widow 52 years old. My husband passed away four years ago after a lingering illness. Five months ago a very dear friend of mine was killed in an accident and her husband turned to me for comfort. We seemed to be good for each other. He told me he would have gone completely to pieces if it hadn't been for my strength and understanding. I never had any romantic interest in this man. He was my friend's husband and I admired him but nothing more. I can see that things are changing, however, as he's made some remarks which lead me to believe he's interested in marriage. It so happens this man has considerable wealth. My sisters have told me they've heard rumors that I am trying my darndest to marry him and that I couldn't wait to hop in and take advantage of the tragedy. They suggest I stop seeing him in order to quiet the rumors. I am sick at heart and don't know what to do.—MRS. X

People who let rumors rule their lives always wind up nowhere. Ignore the wagging tongues and continue to see this man if you enjoy his company. Tell your sisters to spare you the details of the Gossip reports—that you aren't interested in the gossip of fish wives.

(Ann Landers will be happy to help you with your problems. Send them to her in care of this newspaper and enclose a stamped self-addressed envelope.)

Final Days Ocean Hop Speedy, Own Bed Feels Good

By MAXINE BUREN
Statesman Woman's Editor

Life moves right along these days when you can board a plane in Amsterdam at 1:30 a.m. and arrive in Vancouver, B.C. at 3:30 p.m. That's a speedy trip, even if you do set your clocks back seven hours.

I had completed my Scandinavian adventure with an overnight boat trip from Aalborg, Denmark, to Copenhagen. I remained there briefly before coming into the city, rightly called "Wonderful Copenhagen" early on a bright morning. I sat for two hours in the Town Hall Square, like many others, watching the children feed the pigeons, buying an orange and munching it, the strolling around with the other relaxed pedestrians.

I regretted leaving Copenhagen, with its bright sunshine, gay people, unobstructed traffic and its many interesting places to eat. That last morning I discovered "Scandia" where one can sit in a big window overlooking the square and, for the price of a pot of coffee and a Danish pastry, have a box seat to the colorful drama of Denmark's busiest corner.

On the Way

One krona (about 14c) and I had my bus seat to the airport, and in two hours was in Amsterdam. A day of sightseeing was all I had there, but of course would have enjoyed much more. Half of Amsterdam rides bicycles and you can see some funny sights on those busy streets.

There had been a ceremony on the square before the Royal Palace and the town was buzzing with soldiers in very big, very hot and extremely black fur hats called busbies, or with helmets decorated with plumes. There were also some students in top hats and tails, also refugees from the noisy ceremony I saw one of the top-hatted, bearded students riding along on a bicycle, with his best girl sitting sidesaddle on the rack behind.

A tour of the city by bus, took us to the National Museum, where we saw many original Rembrandts, and we watched the diamond cutters at work in one of the many such large plants, but were given no free samples. The afternoon took us through the picturesque canals on a sightseeing boat, where the guide said "spontaneous" little jokes in five languages. The trip however was interesting and the guide faithful to all his foreigners to the end.

Our Canadian Pacific Airlines plane got a late start, but finally was airborne at 1:30 a.m. We had breakfast, then a mid-morning snack and were about ready for lunch when we arrived at the airport in Iceland, where we were greeted by sleepy-eyed hostesses and airport employees—it was only 4:30 there because we weren't keeping time with the earth.

Portland Airport looked good after that cluttered one in Vancouver, B.C. Tumbling gladly into my own rather lumpy bed, I realized that this was the first dark night I'd seen in five weeks.

Though I enjoyed every minute of the Scandinavian adventure, I agreed with a wise friend who always says, "One of the nicest things about a vacation, is coming back to your own bed."
