Captured turtles are kept alive in water corrals to assure fresh meat.

Fishing for Armored Giants

THERE'S MORE to turtle soup than putting it in cans. Nicaraguan natives hunt the dangerous raw material off the coast of Central America with the most primitive of weapons—nets and bare hands. It's a perilous business—the turtles weigh up to 400 pounds—but a lucrative one, because the tasty turtle meat is becoming almost as popular as the soup; so much so that the constant deep-sea hunting has decimated the species. Some governments now have laws limiting the hunting season, others eliminating it altogether to allow the giants in armor to rebuild their numbers.

Nets only ensnare the monsters —bare hands must finish job.
