Protest of Portland Fare Hike Possible

State Public Utilities Commissioner Howard Morgan said Monday he would protest last week's Portland City Council order increasing city bus and street car fares, if the increase is as "drastic as has been indicated by the press."

The council voted to increase the 30-cent fare to 25 cents. The company operating the system is the Rose City Transit Lines.

Morgan said the council failed to comply with the law requiring it to file proposed new rates with him at least 30 days before the council takes action.

He said that if he does protest, the issue automatically would be placed before the voters, of Portland.

Morgan also said that the city council hasn't filed any rate schedules with him since 1952.

20 New Ponds Reported in Soil District

By LILLIE L. MADSEN
 FARM EDITOR, The Statesman

FERFERSON, Jan. 20—Twenty new ponds were built in the Santiam Soil Conservation district this past year, Hollis Ottaway, district secretary reported at the annual meeting held today at Ankeny Grange Hall.

The district has had a "very busy year," Ottaway said as he listed more than 50 practices undertaken. Included were 80,500 feet of tile laid, 705 acres of trees planted, 417 acres of land cleared of debris and 16 miles of open drainage ditch dug.

Changing trends, not only in farming, but in various businesses and methods of living affected by farming, were discussed by Dr. Gerald E. Korzan, professor of agricultural economics at Oregon State College.

"More Than Phrase"
 Dr. Korzan pointed out that vertical integration is becoming more than "a phrase." It is resulting in linking the farmer and the processor together, resulting in fewer food stores at which more people are buying, and threatening the disappearance of wholesaling.

The super-market is replacing the corner grocery and direct selling from farmer to processor to consumer's market is resulting. Trends are also toward more private brands in food processing.

Listed as possible benefits of the new trends which provide contract farming, was the better opportunity for the processor to develop his markets when he is assured of getting needed supplies. Control of quality would be improved, and a more stable market for the farmer assured.

Problems Expected
 However, Dr. Korzan said, the new trend would also produce problems such as a possible decrease in profits for the farmer which may force the farmer to more diversity.

Dr. Korzan gave "more and more efficiency" as the answer to most of the farmers' problems.

Ralph Wilson, Salem, and Ed Gilbert, Aumsville, were returned to the board of directors. Hold-over directors are Sam Galvin, Turner; Max Schultz, Jefferson, Floyd Bates, Salem, and Douglas Heater, Stayton.

Bates presided at today's meeting.
