Double Challenge

A painting not only challenges the seeing skills of the observer but equally challenges the keenness of the audience's mind. An artist puts into his work as much as he can of what he intends. The reader takes out of it as much as he can carry off. This remark of Leo Stein could be extended with the thought that what is carried off is the identity given it by the artist and becomes a new experience, hence a different work of art, in the mind of the observer.
