TODAY'S RECIPES

By SISTER MARY

There has been considerable research in the last few years regarding the value of oysters as a food, and the results justify their liberal use in the family dietary. Although they have long been recognized as an easily digested source of protein, their high water content made them an expensive source of energy. Lack of knowledge concerning their mineral and vitamin content put them in the class of luxuries and one of our most important foods was served chiefly at "church socials" and sleigh rides.

Today oysters hold a significant place among foods. They stand fifth among the sea foods as sources of iodine and compare favorably with eggs as sources of iron. They are rich in vitamin B, good in vitamins A and C and contain some vitamin D. These properties along with their easy digestibility make them an important food for growing children.

Raw oysters are almost as easily digested as raw eggs and are an exceedingly nutritious food to serve to invalids. Steamed, baked and in a plain stew they offer appetizing variety for children and persons in ill health.

The digestibility of cooked oysters depends largely on the care used in cooking. They contain an albuminous substance that must be cooked at a low temperature. Excessive heat and an over-long cooking period will make them tough and leathery and therefore hard to digest.

Made dishes of oysters may be more difficult to digest on account of the added ingredients. In the case of oysters fried in deep fat, for example the oyster is so protected by its coating of crumbs and eggs that it is properly cooked and easily digested, but the coating may offer difficulty to some persons.

Because oysters are generally liked and always have been classed with the "delicacies" they make admirable dishes for informal luncheons and Sunday night suppers. There are innumerable inviting ways of serving them that require little time and effort. As cocktails they make popular beginnings for winter dinners.

Oyster salad can be prepared in several ways. A combination of grapefruit sections and shredded green pepper served with French dressing is delicious. Marinate the fish and fruit separately in French dressing for an hour before combining and serving. Cooked oysters are combined with celery and mayonnaise in another good salad.

Tomorrow's Menu

BREAKFAST: Chilled apple sauce, cereal, cream, waffles with syrup, milk, coffee.

LUNCHEON: Oyster curry in rice border, bran and raisin bread, carrot sticks, grapes, milk, tea.

DINNER: Shepherd's pie, cauliflower in cream sauce, beet and celery salad, fruit jelly with whipped cream, cocoanut layer cake, milk, coffee.
