TODAY'S RECIPES

By SISTER MARY

MANY mothers want children to have a hot drink for breakfast, particularly on those mornings when a hot cereal is not served. But with coffee taboo for growing girls and boys, and the ideal hot milk seldom proving popular, just what to serve becomes more or less of a problem.

Older children may find a cereal "coffee" served with hot milk quite to their liking. Young children from 6 to 10 or 12 years of age need a drink containing more actual food value than the cereal beverage unless it is made wholly with milk. A cup of hot milk flavored with one or two tablespoons of a cereal coffee infusion may appeal to the juniors.

Cocoa also makes an excellent flavoring for the cup of hot milk suitable for the juniors' breakfast.

Fat, starch and protein are found in dry cocoa, and when whole milk is used and sugar is added, the result is a drink of high food value, nourishing and wholesome. One cup of cocoa made entirely with whole milk furnishes 217 calories of protein, fat and carbohydrate.

Since cocoa contains starch, care must be taken in the making of the drink. Thorough cooking is necessary for the starch, but undesirable for the milk, so the cocoa must be well cooked before the milk is added.

The "skin" which sometimes forms on top of cocoa is the albumen of the milk coagulated by heat. Care in not overheating the milk and constant stirring while the milk is heating do much to prevent this. Beating with a duster beater after the milk is added increases the smoothness of the drink and tends to remove the "skin" if the milk has been allowed to stand.

Chocolate and cocoa may be used interchangeably, but cocoa is less rich in fat and easier to digest. This makes it a better beverage for small children.

Individual Cocoa

One scant teaspoon cocoa, 2 teaspoons sugar, 2 tablespoons boiling water, 3-4 cup milk, few grains salt, 2 drops vanilla.

Mix sugar and cocoa in a small sauce pan. Add boiling water and cook and stir over fire until a thick smooth scrup. Add milk and salt. Heat, stirring constantly. Do not let mixture scald. Add vanilla and serve at once. Protein, 30. Fat, 94. Carbohydrate, 57. Total calories, 217.

Tomorrow's Menu

BREAKFAST: Orange juice, cereal, cream, baked French toast, brown sugar syrup, cocoa, coffee.

LUNCHEON: Onions in cheese sauce on toast, tomato and celery salad, rice pudding, grape juice.

DINNER: Veal timbale, creamed corn, kale with lemon butter, stuffed pear salad, gingerbread with whipped cream, milk, coffee.

If children quarrel in the family, the wise mother will suggest something to take their minds off the argument. She won't nag and fret and plead, "Children, if you don't stop fighting, I'll run away and stay away."

Postpone the "Lecture."

It is all right for her to remind them that it is unpleasant for everybody around when there is fussing, but not at the time of the trouble. If she does, almost every word she says will be used against her. Like every other reminder, talking should be done between times, not during a crisis.

As for quarrels with other children, it is better not to interfere unless there is continued abuse and a real reason for fighting things. After all, life is one long battle. When children grow up they will have to take their own parts. A little pugnacity or spunk is a good thing. We cannot understand quite the motives or reasons behind their fusses, anyway.

We should not take their quarrels too much to heart. We would be very busy and very unhappy if we did.

Don't Worry, Parents!

The quarrels of children are not serious. Usually they are merely an assertion of will, a contest for supremacy, or the resentment of an imposition that evaporates almost as quickly as it gathers.

The words children say, the things they do when they are angry, are usually exaggerated. They do not nurse spite as long as older ones do. Moreover, they do not mean a tenth of what they say. They lack vocabulary to express their precise feelings, and lack the tact, patience, and wisdom to right affairs where other people could do it very nicely without trouble.
