YOUR CHILDREN By OLIVE ROBERTS BARTON

I WISH I had a kopek for every Halloween costume I have made, for every clown suit, zyrer dress, and toe dancer I've turned out.

Also one for every prayer I have prayed as I looked at the thin garms laid out on the bed, that the weather would be warm and dry.

That is the trouble with Halloween. Even the smart literates sold now from Captain Kidd's ferocious outfit to Little Bo Peep's wide skirts are made of percale or asteen or muslin, or gauze.

And children thus decked out won't wear coats over them on the street if they can help it.

A Fairy in a Coat! I remember one night when I kept putting my head out of doors to test the temperature. One girl was being a fairy. I had been coaxed into making a butterfly affair of pale blue tulle and even painting a pair of summer pumps to match.

Each time I had a look outdoors things grew worse. It was not only cold but it had started to drizzle.

The children were having a parade. There were to be prizes how could I face a little girl who had been in the rain for hours?

Finally I telephoned some other mothers in the same predicament. All were as cowardly as I was about facing their children with the bad news.

Persuasion Out of Question The little girl who had been in the rain for hours offered less of a problem. A sweater or two might make a small warmer look like a very fat Indian, but that was all. No other mother, it seems, had quite my problem of a tulle dress. Most of their children could be "stuffed."

The fairy-to-be owned a sweater, a heavy one with a turtle neck and a stretching quality. But it was red, bright red.

Could I persuade my child that very often fairies wear heavy sweaters under their gauzy clothes—red ones? And that gossamer was quite the thing in fairy land?

Perhaps I could. The parade was being very short and a crowd was coming back to our house for games later on. She could then shed the extras and shine in her pristine beauty.

Cowardice or Common Sense? Then my daughter walked in. And she said, "Mother, I can't wear that dress tonight. It's freezing cold and all rain."

Lord love us! The child had more sense than I had. She dressed up but didn't go out. And later she was belle of the ball at our little party.

I often think over that night and my cowardice. What was I thinking about to try to bargain with my common sense, that way?

This story has no particular point except one thing. If the weather is cold or damp on Halloween, bundle up the children well under their gay riggings. Put thick shoes on their feet, or overshoes.
