DARROW DARES TO CRITICIZE

IF those who selected Clarence Darrow for the NRA review board expected merely to use his name to give rating to some laudatory pliffs, they deceived themselves rather than the public. Though nearing 80, this old veteran of the legal battlefields is by no means childish or feeble-minded, and his sharp mind cuts through shams and non-essentials. And so we find him bluntly denouncing the "fair competition" efforts of NRA as "illusory" and "discriminatory", tending to strengthen monopolies and increase the power of big business over small. Characteristically, Darrow names, by name, specific instances—in the steel industry, the coal industry, the movie industry.

Much bitterness marks the reception of this report so uncomplimentary to those who think they are saving the land. "Crackdown" Johnson (whose cracking has been almost entirely verbal) calls the report "superficial, intemperate, and inaccurate". Young Mr. John F. Sinclair, the dissenting member of Mr. Darrow's review board calls it "inconclusive, incomplete, misleading". Mr. Sinclair, by the way, is a professional reformer who has wanted his way from the Y. M. C. A. uplift circuits into the big league of Brains Trust and New Deal. Washington correspondents tell an amusing story of how young Mr. Sinclair fancied that he would dictate the policies of the NRA review board in view of the great age of its chairman. Mr. Darrow sat on him, deflated him, flattened him with barbs of sarcasm and irony which have been sharpened in many a trial.

In any event, the great battle of the NRA is on. The Darrow report lays a groundwork for a major issue in the next national election. NRA will either thrive or perish under free criticism. In our opinion, it will perish if those in command attempt to go arrogantly on, ignoring all dissenting opinion. Darrow lays his finger on the great weakness of NRA. It lacks any clearcut foundation of purpose, philosophy. It goes through the motions of reducing business competition to certain "fair practices". It tries to ignore the truth which Darrow states so plainly, that all competition is "savagely, wolfish, relentless". We must decide whether we are going to keep competition (the price and profit system) or abolish it utterly.

Darrow claims we have the choice between "monopoly sustained by government which is clearly the trend in NRA and a planned economy which demands socialized ownership and control". Johnson retorts that this is "a choice between fascism and communism". We do not like Darrow's alternatives any better than Johnson does, but if Gen. Johnson will look at facts instead of fancies, he will see that the situation is so.

Is there any other choice? It seems to us there is. We are not ready for either of the extremes. The one great purpose which the NRA can fulfill is the better distribution of work and wages. If we are to keep competition in any form, this is the only restriction on competition which is practical. We cannot and should not seek to guarantee profits; we cannot protect business men against each other or their own follies, but we can effectively keep business from charging its losses and follies to labor through the devices of uneconomic hours of work and starvation wages.

Let NRA spread work, protect wages, and stop there!

SIGNS OF PROSPERITY

WHEN the circus played in Eugene Sunday afternoon, every seat in the big top was filled. Here and elsewhere along the route the circus people reported the best business in six years.

But of course, the circus is the circus and the week-end is always the big payoff for such enterprises. When a circus plays a week-end date in any town one expects other competing enterprises to suffer. Yet Sunday evening found Eugene theaters filled, people standing in line between shows, a phenomenon not seen for years.

There are many other signs that people have money and that having it they are determined to spend and live. Motor car dealers report the best sales in several years, and nearly half of them are cash sales. Department stores, clothing stores, restaurants, hotels report increases not only in cash volume but in number of sales.

Too many are still unemployed or on purely temporary employment and too many are still on charity or government work-dole, but the many millions who have been more fortunate through the depression are bringing their cash out of hiding. Whatever uncertainties the future may hold, the American people have laid aside FEAR.

Alfonso, the former king of Spain wants to play with Mae West in the movies, says a Hollywood dispatch. Sure, so does the Kaiser and Mussolini, no doubt. Mae could do a lot for royalties.

Reading the list of week-end fatalities all over the country, Blue River Bill wonders if a modern civilization really needs war to equalize things, as some of the old-fashioned philosophers contend.

Blue River Bill has a solemn thought. He says that after all the hue and cry in the primaries, ain't it too bad the nation can't be saved again till November.

Headline in the Statesman says: "Teacher Presents Map at Graduation". Sort of a personal appearance, we take it.

It was 445 years since the menu card was invented so German has discovered. Some of the originals still seem to be in circulation here.

Congress held special memorial services in honor of Lafayette Saturday. McGurk says: "Yes, Lafayette, we are still here!"

Former President Machado of Cuba, fleeing extradition, might not have heard of the Mediterranean cruise of Samuel Insull.

The government's new census of the jobless is to cost 10 millions, or about one dollar a head.

Now that the primaries are over we are waiting for three people to give three cheers.

WASHINGTON LETTER

BY RODNEY DUTCHER (Register-Guard Washington Correspondent)

WASHINGTON, May 21.—In one of the most mysterious bits of patronage shenanigans this capital has ever known—marked by turmoil among hundreds of federal employes and backstage wire-pulling—Senator Hubert D. Stephens of Mississippi finally "got his man".

The victim was Dr. Willard L. Thorp, appointed last July as head of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, whose nomination was withdrawn by Roosevelt after Stephens had told him all Democratic committee members were opposed.

Other senators say, however, that Thorp's name would have been promptly confirmed if it had ever come openly before the committee or the Senate as a whole.

But Stephens, as chairman of the Senate Commerce committee, is now being given credit for having driven from public life, single handed, this "brain trust member and nationally famous economist who had strong support from both Roosevelt and Secretary of Commerce Dan Roper.

The mystery of Stephens' animosity is unexplained. He was aided by a whispering campaign widely circulated by vindictive former bureau employes and by disloyal Thorp subordinates who sought advancement or a chance for more political spoils.

Thorp had insisted that applicants possess merit as well as political endorsements. So the wrecking crew, which included a former Hoover employe, spread word over Capitol Hill that Thorp would fire all Democrats and appoint only Republicans.

Postmaster General Jim Farley, defending Roosevelt's withdrawal, now complains privately that Thorp once took two weeks to pass on the appointment of the son of a New York political boss which "should have taken 20 minutes." Farley may have secretly encouraged Stephens.

In a secret, personal poll of Democratic committee members, Stephens was able to tell some that Thorp was a poor Democrat, each of several others that he was the single individual necessary for a unanimous front against Thorp, and still others that Roper was secretly opposed to Thorp and that the economist's name must be kept off the floor if serious embarrassment to high Democrats were to be avoided.

Housevelt had no thought of withdrawing the nomination until Stephens came and told him that all Democrats were opposed.

Months of uncertainty, fear, inefficiency, and low morale in the big Foreign and Domestic Commerce Bureau, caused a secret fight against Thorp and the likelihood that all jobs would be delivered to the spoils-men, aren't ended.

But Assistant Secretary of Commerce John Dickinson, who threatened to resign if plotting politicians were given bureau control, has been placed in charge and is trying to get a man approaching Thorp's caliber to take the job.

Plotting in the bureau who helped Stephens "get" Thorp are believed due for the ax. Among them is believed to be Assistant Director Russell Amory, a Meadwo protege and hard-boiled spoilsman.

Meanwhile, the records bulge with fulsome tributes to Thorp's ability, achievements, and desirability—from Roosevelt, Roper, Dickinson, and many others.

But Thorp will go back to teaching economics at Amherst—no longer an amateurish babe in the maze of partisan politics.

YEARN FOR LYNCHING "FUN"

Senator Cushman of Colorado, sponsor of the anti-lynching bill, receives letters from residents of non-lynching areas wishing the writers could be in on some lynchings. Some of the writers are business men. . . . General Peyton March, wartime chief of staff, attends the big league ball games here daily. Still rooting at the age of 60. . . . Roosevelt's executive offices will be extended another 60 feet because of growing presidential business. The White House has had to take over a couple of rooms in the State, War, and Navy Building for its mail. . . . The 17-year-old daughter of Assistant Postmaster General William W. Howes is named Mary Senate Howes, because Howes was a South Dakota state senator when she was born and the legislature at once passed a law providing that all girls born at the hour she arrived must be given the middle name of "Senate."

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

BY DR. MORRIS FISHER (Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygiene, the Health Magazine)

YOU may be able to exist without food from 30 to 40 days and without water from five to seven days, but you can't do without oxygen for even five minutes. If you are deprived of oxygen for even one minute, you would be in a serious situation and if this should be extended only slightly, you would become unconscious and life would end.

The margin of oxygen reserve in your body is so narrow that it is easily crossed, and yet it is a margin between life and death.

Anything that interrupts breathing is a menace to life. Your whole breathing mechanism, moreover, is so complicated that various types of interruption are possible.

There is that portion of the brain which controls the automatic character of breathing; there are the nerves in the spine and those leading from the spine to the muscles that are involved in breathing; there are the passages through which the air flows and the lungs themselves.

Anything that blocks the passages or that breaks the pathways along which the stimulus to breathing moves may bring about death. Therefore, our whole lives are spent in getting sufficient oxygen.

The period for which anyone can hold his breath without discomfort is apparently limited to 45 seconds. If, however, you prepare yourself for holding your breath by breathing slowly and deeply for a certain length of time, you may be able to do without breathing for anywhere from five to six minutes.

If, in addition to that, the air you breathe is supplemented with extra oxygen, you can extend the period without motions of breathing to almost 15 minutes.

It has been pointed out that the spirit swimmers in recent Olympic games breathed oxygen before entering the races and had a considerable advantage because of that fact.

When you exert effort you breathe more oxygen than when at rest. At rest you breathe about one-fourth quart of oxygen a minute. While walking briskly, you breathe about a quart a minute, and during heavy work or violent exercise from one and one-half to two quarts a minute.

The most oxygen that you can store up in your body is about three quarts. Therefore, the marathon runner in question is using up his oxygen about as fast as he can take it in.

However, nature provides the body with factors of safety so that it is possible to run up an oxygen debt. Trained athletes are able to run up this debt as high as 15 quarts of oxygen.

That is the athletes who are so well trained that they do not have to worry about getting a second wind, since their oxygen is adequate before they start.

Getting a second wind is the development of enough oxygen reserve to carry on activity without discomfort.
