BYRD VIOLATES A RULE

WHEN Admiral Byrd chose to spend the Arctic winter alone in an outpost hut 125 miles from his main party at Little America, he violated one of the first rules for those who explore wild places, which is, never to go alone into any wilderness if it can be prevented. Even with two people, the risk is great. Safety rules call for not less than three.

The Admiral probably had good reasons for taking such a risk. Possibly because, it was so risky he figured that the loss of one life, even his own life, would be less dangerous to the rest of the party than the loss of several. The reports which are coming through by wireless show how near he came to paying the penalty.

Sickness was the unforeseen factor at the meteorological outpost. Poisoned by gases from his stove, unable to risk the appalling cold outside, the Admiral was literally dying by inches when rescue reached him. He showed great fortitude in this emergency. He did for himself all any man could do under such circumstances. He guarded his food. He took care of his shelter. He called for help. He kept his head. And, with great devotion he worked away at his scientific observations, a splendid precaution against insanity in such a plight.

But, the risk was on which should never be taken. Science moves too slowly through the centuries to warrant such chances.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

THOSE revelations before the Congressional investigating committee at Los Angeles have a horrendous sound. First we hear of a "silver shirt" outfit which tries to buy government weapons, drills regularly and meditates the seizure of power; then we are told of an active Communist group which is subsidized by film stars, of all people, and which used the San Francisco general strike as a mere rehearsal of the dire things it plans to inflict on the nation a little later.

And yet, somehow, it is hard to escape the feeling that a lot of good people are getting more disturbed by these disclosures than they really need be. This pseudo-Nazi group seems, clearly, to be the kind of movement which can be left to the good sense of the average citizen. And the Reds? Well, according to testimony before the committee, they number about 2000 in Los Angeles—something under one-half of one per cent of the population.

And if you remember prohibition days, you'll recall that there's no kick at all in a solution that weak.

TORYISM STILL LIVES.

SIR PERCIVAL PERRY, chairman of the Ford Motor Company of London, seems to be one of those old-school Englishmen who feel that the world's shipping and export trades belong to England by divine right and that it is somehow impious for other nations to presume to have a share in them.

Speaking at a meeting of the Anglo-American Club in London the other day, Sir Percival criticized the United States for subsidizing its shipping lines (a stout England has employed for generations), declared that American exports should be limited to such raw materials as tobacco and cotton, and complained that it is unfair for the United States to try to keep those South American and Far Eastern markets which she took away from Britain during the World War.

One had supposed that old-fashioned Toryism of this kind had just about died out in England. Apparently it still has a survivor or two.

WHAT OTHER EDITORS THINK

THE PINK IN PEDAGOGY
(Astorian-Budget)

IN relation to the new importance which has been given Communist and radical activities in this country there is one matter of which cognizance should be taken by the entire nation; namely, the tolerance with which the activities of the "pink" and even violently red instructors in our institutions of higher learning have been regarded.

The presence of such men and the nature of their teachings has been a subject of more or less tolerant comment in the press for some time. Such an element is evidently present in a large number of our colleges and universities and some of them are well permeated by this doctrine.

The time has come when this matter should be seriously investigated. Many of them are men without any worldly viewpoint, imbued with a purely professional outlook and rather proud of being "different" and "shocking" in their expressions of radical sentiments. Others are of a definite radical trend and are exclaiming their teaching efforts with the plane of the Communist party. Oregon schools are not free from such contamination.

The situation is one that should be swiftly and firmly handled. Little progress can be made toward the eradication of this element as long as we permit youthful minds to be subverted with such instruction particularly in state-supported institutions of learning where it is given at least tacit official approval by its very presence.

A campaign to clean our universities and colleges of such dangerous radicals should be initiated at once and carried to completion.

WASHINGTON LETTER

By RODNEY DUTCHER
(Register-Guard Washington Correspondent)

WASHINGTON, Aug. 20.—Your correspondent has just emerged from a long underwater plunge through a sea of figures having to do with the condition of the U. S. treasury.

Economists, statisticians and fiscal experts need read no further. But the rest of you might be interested in gathering 'round. There may be some way of simplifying this thing without all of us getting too dizzy.

The last session of Congress appropriated nearly $4,000,000,000 for emergency purposes, and $3,600,000,000 for regular government expenses, applying to the fiscal year ending June, 1935. Lots of people have the jitters about it, but the more you look at the figures the more you realize why anyone who believes in the New Deal isn't losing any sleep about its "day of reckoning."

Just to keep that promise of simplification, let's look at the latest daily treasury statement. (Trained deep-sea divers led me through that morass, or I wouldn't suggest it.) Notice that the New Deal to date has paid out $6,750,000,000 through its emergency agencies and still has an appropriated $6,350,000,000 available for spending and lending in this fiscal year. Total: $13,080,000,000. Roll that over your tongue a moment and then remember:

That much of the balance may not be spent.

That the first figure includes Reconstruction Finance Corporation lending operations in the Hoover administration.

Billions Are Theoretically Repayable

That about $7,000,000,000 is theoretically repayable and perhaps a billion more, including federal public works, is being turned into tangible assets.

That against the last fiscal year's New Deal deficit of $3,000,000,000 you can count the $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund and another "profit" of $800,000,000 derived from dollar devaluation and gold revaluation.

That a major business revival would boom tax receipts so as to make huge inroads in the deficits.

The public debt, however, is counted as $27,180,000,000 now as against $22,800,000,000 a year ago and most of the worry seems to be to the fact that Congress has guaranteed the principal of more than $4,000,000,000 of Home Loan and Farm Credit bonds—a new obligation—and placed no limit on RFC advances to itself for purchase of preferred bank stock, to the AAA for benefit payments, or to FERA for the housing program.

Of course the AAA expects to reimburse the RFC advances from processing taxes. The RFC has bought about all the preferred stock it expects to, and the experts insist there's little possibility of loss through FFA.

Relief Money Has Gone Over Dam

The one big actual New Deal expense from which no return or subsequent tangible asset is to be expected is that for relief—$850,000,000 to date through FERA and $248,000,000 unexpended plus more available in a $400,000,000 unallotted fund held at Roosevelt's discretion, along with $805,000,000 for the CWA program, and $714,000,000 spent and unpaid for Emergency Conservation Work.

The treasury statement charges up $2,412,000,000 as issued by RFC for direct loans and expenditures in the last and previous fiscal years and $2,000,000,000 more unexpended. Much of the two billions may never be drained away, as the RFC in the first five weeks of this fiscal year astonished everybody by receiving $150,000,000 more in repayments than it paid out.

Many More Millions May Come Back

Other items in the "repayable" class include $808,000,000 for AAA, $735,000,000 in loans from PWA's $3,300,000,000 appropriation—plus some future loans—$925,000,000 for farm credit operations, $150,000,000 for Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and $375,000,000 for HOLC.

Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau would be feeling a bit happier if the mild inflationary aspect of his recent nationalization of silver hadn't caused a market slump in government bonds. Although the treasury has plenty of cash at the moment, about five billions of its obligations mature this year and it may have to do about four billions of new borrowing.

If things really get tough, the president can require the Federal Reserve banks to buy three billions of government bonds—or print three billions in currency to pay bills, which means a carload of inflation.

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

BY DR. MORRIS FISHER

Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygiene, the Health Magazine

SOME people have the vague notion that there are special diets for every disease that afflicts mankind and that a good many diseases can be cured by diet alone. This impression arises, no doubt, simply because the satisfaction of hunger is one of the fundamental disorders of mankind.

Actually, there are a few major diseases in which the prescription of a specific diet is absolutely essential. In the majority of diseases, however, general diets are prescribed, such as soft diets, rough diets, high protein and low protein, high carbohydrate and low carbohydrate, or high fat and low fat diets.

It is also impossible to increase the amounts of calcium or of iron or of other mineral salts by selection of certain food substances. Any good diet must, however, have suitable amounts of mineral salts and vitamins.

The main diseases in which doctors find it necessary to prescribe diets are diabetes, overweight and underweight, inflammations of the kidney and more, recently, epilepsy.

There are, of course, some cases in which it is believed that the restriction of salt may be of value and there are some who place a great deal of emphasis on having diets that are very low in acid-forming substances.

The vast majority of people have to depend in their diets on certain fundamental foods. These are bread, milk, cereals, buttermilk, cheese, eggs, and common fruits and vegetables, and meats.

In overweight, it is customary that the person have certain proteins necessary for the building of tissue, limited carbohydrates and fats, and all the necessary mineral salts and vitamins.

In most diets for overweight, it is customary to raise the protein requirement to about double the usual amount and then to cut down the carbohydrates and the fats, so that the total number of calories will be 1200 a day or less.

In diabetes it is customary to cut down the carbohydrates and to cut down also the total calories. Thus one may give 30 grams of carbohydrates, 30 grams of protein, and 90 grams of fat with a total of 1085 calories or, maintaining the same proportions, 50 grams of carbohydrates, 50 grams of protein, and 150 grams of fat, with a total of 1805 calories.

This is essentially a high fat diet, whereas other authorities believe in lowering the total amount of fat, giving one gram of carbohydrates to one gram of fat instead of one gram of carbohydrates and one gram of protein to three grams of fat.

When there is a large amount of albumen in the urine, it is customary to give a fairly high protein diet, whereas in cases of complicated heart and kidney conditions, it is customary to give a low protein diet and to restrict the amount of salt.

In epilepsy the so-called ketogenic diet is used with a large amount of fat.

It is obviously just as difficult for anyone who is not suitably informed to treat himself with diets according to modern knowledge and opinions as it would be for him to attempt to prescribe potent drugs.
