

ARIZONA FARMERS TERRORIZE RIVAL JAPANESE, HINDUS

PHOENIX, Ariz., Sept. 21.—(U.P.)—Although terrified by the bombs thrown by night riders, Japanese farmers clung stubbornly today to their little farms in the fertile Salt river valley.

The bombings climaxed weeks of threats against the orientals who invaded one of the largest irrigated districts in the world and instituted their intensive system of farming with its dawn-to-dusk labor.

The Japanese and Hindu settlers in the valley appealed to their consular authorities for protection after the bombing incidents. None of them showed any inclination to abandon their farms, despite the threats of American farm leaders to take the law into their own hands unless the orientals are expelled.

Local authorities appeared to be making no progress in a search for the terrorists.

The first outbreak, renewing the farm war between aliens and valley farmers, came last week, it was revealed by reports in the sheriff's office. Six automobiles filled with men drove to the farm of D. Tadano and while four men held Tadano at bay with guns, other members of the party pushed his automobile into an irrigation canal.

One man then fired at the Japanese. When Tadano fell to the ground the men left. He was uninjured.

Tuesday night and Wednesday morning, activities of the night riders were renewed when they threw a bomb into the flood gates of the M. Takikawa farm, flooding 20 acres of lettuce, blowing a screen door off the farmhouse and damaging the floor.

Another group threw a bomb into an irrigation ditch on the farm of Fred Okuma, reputed wealthy farmer in the district and a leader of the Japanese. The first bomb was water-soaked and failed to explode. The party returned later and tossed another bomb into the ditch but it caused little damage.

The sheriff's office said it had no clues in any of the cases.
