LET'S SEE SOME MATHEMATICS.

REPLYING to criticisms of his claim that the Bonneville power project can be made to net $15,000,000 a year for Oregon tax relief on a 18.75 per cent split for the state, Hon. Joe E. Dunne, candidate for governor, releases a blast about the wicked "subsidized press." This attack on the press is very old stuff and rather amusing at the time when the Big Boys in Portland who are supposed to be the "vested interests" have shied away from Gen. Martin because of his dangerously liberal views and are using all their arts and powers to line up support for the jovial Joe himself.

However, that is all beside the point. What the oft-killed taxpayers would like to see is just how the amiable Joe figures this $15,000,000 a year for the state's share of Bonneville profits because his estimates have not come within gunshot of the estimates the engineers have given out which reduce this estimate to less than $750,000 a year by the most optimistic count. On what production basis were the Dunne figures made? On what rates to the consuming public?

Just in the interest of science, if not fair play in politics (for we have watched politics too long to expect that) we extend to Candidate Dunne the offer of 1,000 words of news space, absolutely free, to explain to an eager public the calculations on which his figures are based. What engineers made the calculations? On what production in either horse power or kilowatt hours does the promise rest? What rate must be charged to the public to earn $80,000,000 a year on $25,000,000 (minimum) or $150,000,000 maximum investment, for that is what must be paid if Oregon is to get $15,000,000 a year on 18.75 per cent split?

IN LIGHT OF THE PAST.

IF popular literature reflects the current of the national mind properly, Americans are doing a great deal of wishful thinking about the vanished past these days.

During the last two years the publishers have brought out a surprisingly large number of books which mirror the past as a time of high charm and contentment.

Some of them are novels and some of them are books of reminiscence; some of them look back to the time before the Civil War, and some of them go back only to the nineties; but through book after book there runs the melancholy sentiment that things used to be ever so much happier and more secure than they are now.

This contrast is not drawn with reference to the depression. It is as if the depression, to these authors, simply climaxed a progression that had been going on for a long time; a progression away from the old simplicities, the old virtues, the old contentments.

A great deal of this sentiment is undeniably justified. Life did move in a more even tempo, in the old days. Men's ideas were less confused. Their certainties were less open to question.

The one unquestionable fact is that we have moved into a time of profound change, and it is as confusing and generally unhappy a period as any in modern history.

Yet however much this looking back at the past may save our wounded feelings and meet our wishful desire to re-create a time when the world was younger and less perplexing, in the long run it will do us precious little good.

For the past, after all, is the past. It can't be brought back. For better or worse, we have moved on, and we can't find salvation by looking over our shoulders at the shadowy places beneath the trees.

We may not like the present era. It may be inferior to grandfathers' day in any of a dozen ways. But it is the era we have to live in; and only by facing it resolutely and bravely can we pave the way for a future that will be an improvement on it.

Once in a great while the stream of human history makes an abrupt, right-angled turn, away from everything that people are familiar with, on toward the unknown.

UNLUCKY IN HISTORY.

FUELED MARSHAL ALEXANDER VON KLUCK, who died in Berlin the other day at the age of 88, will go down in history with about as much melancholy a claim to fame as any military man could have.

It was Von Kluck who commanded the right flank army when Germany swept through Belgium into France in 1914. The great invasion seemed irresistible, for a time—then, suddenly, something went wrong, and that long series of scattered fights known as the battle of the Marne resulted in a shattering German defeat.

Von Kluck was the man on the spot in all this. The defeat was not his fault. Moltke, then the commander-in-chief, must take that responsibility.

But Von Kluck's name is the name one remembers in connection with it. As long as military history is studied, he will be known as the man who was beaten at the Marne.

A unique apparatus permits speeches to be heard in four different languages at the same time, at the League of Nations assemblies, with four different meanings as usual.

WHAT OTHER EDITORS THINK

UP THE SIU LAU

TAKE a road map of western Oregon. The Pacific highway from Portland to Grants Pass is like a spine (shows some curvature, of course). The ribs are the roads west to the Pacific and east to the Mountain passes. The road down the Columbia to Astoria is more like a collar bone than a rib; but the "ribs" are numerous from the McMinnville-Tillamook road clear down to the road from Grants Pass to Crescent City. These "ribs" as a rule follow down the coastal streams by easy grades and find low passes over the Coast mountains.

One of the newer of these "rib" roads is the one down the Siu Lau to Florence. Much of it is an old road; but the lower end, from Mapleton to Florence down the river has been finished only recently. We traveled the length of the road from Florence to the Willamette valley the other day, and want to say that it is one of the beautiful roads of Oregon.

The lower road parallels the Siu Lau, an interesting tidal stream clear to Mapleton, and after leaving the river the road follows interesting mountain creeks nearly all the way to Triangle Lake. The valley is narrow, like the Alsea, with homes and small dairy farms crowded between river and hills. At this season the foliage is very beautiful—the yellow of alder and the red of vine maple glowing against backgrounds of green fir and cedar. Streams are very low now; but in rainy weather they must be quite picturesque dashing down over their rocky beds. The newer portions of the road is up to excellent standards of engineering. It is surfaced with gravel now; but later will probably be oiled. It is a comfortable road to drive.

This Siu Lau highway will make another staunch "rib" in the road system of the state. It will be valuable for local travel. It will also prove a delightful drive for those wishing to make loop trips to the coast.

WASHINGTON LETTER

By RODNEY DUTCHER
Register-Guard Washington Correspondent
WASHINGTON, Oct. 27.—Down at the NRA, industrialists are now meeting economists face to face. The new censorship imposed by Chairman Clay Williams of the National Industrial Recovery Board doesn't quite suppress the fact that the NIRE is out to break down artificial price and production controls a lot faster than anyone is officially willing to admit.

Industries which came here in the heyday of code-making and wrote their own tickets are now being told on the basis of experience with the codes, what will work and what won't.

Licenses to seek the consumer are being canceled as fast as the board can get them. Care is being taken not to demoralize industries by removal of price controls—especially in those exploiting natural resources—but the mere fact that free competition means destruction for minorities of high cost plants isn't bothering NIRE.

The economists on NIRE—Hamilton, Marshall, and Henderson—are loaded with figures, facts, and charts supplied by the Research and Planning Division, as well as opinions from the economists on the Advisory Council, to shoot at the code authorities.

"SILLY" CODES TO PASS
Businessmen with codes not yet approved or with codes about to be amended find a virtually united front of the seven NIRE members when they protest.

They are told that neither public opinion nor the courts will stand for some of the things they wrote into the codes. Nor Congress, for that matter. So why be silly?

In the face of NRA's new factual approach, there are fewer explosions than you might suppose. Most businessmen apparently want to retain the codes—for there are other advantages besides the price-fixing privileges.

And they're being told that in such industries as are allowed to retain price control measures to avoid damage to the national recovery program, the government will demand the right to open and inspect all books and accounts.

In natural resource industries, the further idea is to institute programs for long-range national planning.

BIG CASES COMING UP
Precedents are being set in minor industries now which are likely to govern larger industrial codes later. A recent example was that in the cast-iron pipe industry, which petitioned for extension of an "emergency" price-fixing privilege and was turned down.

Big cases to watch—it you can see behind the censorship—involve the lumber, automobile, and banking codes. In November after the elections, there will be hot behind-the-scenes fights on the issues involved.

Price fixing is the issue in lumber and NIRE must decide whether to let the present provisions continue, take a chance on upsetting the industry by drastic exclusion, or merely to start whittling away while trying to work out a long-range program for the industry.

AUTO INDUSTRY FIGHT FARED
NIRE hasn't been grappling with serious labor issues, but there's a fight on both the celebrated "merchandise clause" and the "averaging" provision of the automobile code. The latter calls for a maximum working week which doesn't mean anything, because hours may be "averaged" over a given period.

A labor victory is rather likely here, but the automobile industry is so hard-boiled in these matters that there'll be some sensational headlines before you hear the last of it.

Meanwhile, NIRE is placing plenty of responsibility on NRA administrators and deputy administrators appointed by General Johnson. It brings them in to hear their recommendations and suggestions.

At the same time, it looks as if the industry is going to decide which ones to keep and which to lose. It is going to lose quite a few.

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

By DR. MORRIS FISHBREIN
Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygiene, the Health Magazine.

ALWAYS in the past there has been the idea that a fever was dangerous to the human body and that something should be done right away to bring down the temperature. Occasionally, however, some authority has raised his voice to argue that the fever might be beneficial if it did not get too high or last too long.

Around 1917 a German investigator named Wagner-Jauregg showed that a fever brought about artificially might in some cases be of value in general paralysis. He induced fever by inoculating the insane paralytics with malaria.

Then other investigators found that the same effect could be brought about by inoculating them with a nonspecific protein, such as a typhoid vaccine.

Finally it was discovered that the temperature could be raised by prolonged hot baths and by electrical methods, and it was proved that, in such instances, it was the fever which brought about the good result rather than the method by which the fever was induced.

As a result, manufacturers have developed all kinds of apparatus for inducing rises in the temperature of the human body, and maintaining the temperature according to the length of time that the physician may think necessary.

Types of apparatus now offered include electrical blankets, cabinets with electric lights, hot baths, machines for passing an electric current through the body, and air-conditioned cabinets.

The Christians Standard Of Life

Text: Ephesians 4:17-27; 5:15-21
The International Union Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 28.

By WM. E. GILROY, D. D.
Editor of Advance

FOR the Christian standard of life we turn to the interpretation of a great master Christian as he gave it to early disciples in the church of Ephesus.

Paul was a man "who had learned Christ," and that is what he sets down as the one great foundation of all Christian living. We cannot follow his example, we cannot emulate his example, unless we have so lived with Him and so taken His teaching into our lives that we have learned from Him as a Master.

What is this deepest of all truths in Jesus that Paul says we may learn of Christ? It is the lesson that our lives can be recreated and renewed, that we can put on what Paul calls "the new man created in righteousness and holiness," putting away all the evil attitudes and evil words and evil acts that are associated with the "old man."

Paul, who saw the Christian life in all its largeness and comprehensiveness, saw it also in its most minute details of daily living. The large life of love and righteousness and truth was to be manifest in a restraint upon evil temper and upon a hasty tongue. The more truly man had his heart set upon the higher things, the more inevitably would he refrain from evil habits and practices.

Paul saw this Christian life as a life of self-control and discipline, but as a life of elemental peace, of disharmony and discord had been come through grace. The Christian life was one of a joy that could not be shaken by suffering and persecution.

In his own life he showed that in the darkness of a prison, with feet fast in the stocks, he was a companion could sing praises to God. It meant that he had an experience like that which was possible for every Christian.

It was not some great thing to which only a few attain; but common people, common aims and wrong attitudes, common peace and joy through the creation of their lives by the work of Christ.

This is the standard of Christian living. Our lesson is given us in international temperance lessons, standard applies to every aspect of life and to everything that weakens or destroys the soul's peace and strength.

Paul saw men and women themselves over to evil habits, evil practices in the hope of some stimulation and interesting young folks today would say, "What a kick out of life." He pointed out that it was not a way of escape or of dumbness; it was a way of inspiration and of stimulating living even to intoxication. But the words were, "Be not drunk with where in excess; but be filled with the Spirit."

That is intoxication to man's pose.
