"HO HUM"—1700 YEARS AGO!

IT might help us to face our current problems with more hope if we could only make use of the ingenious time machine described in H. G. Wells' famous novel.

This was a machine, as you remember, by which one could rove about in time as an automobile enables one to rove about in space. You could go either forward or backward—back to ancient Rome or forward to the millennium, whichever you chose.

If we could get hold of such a machine, and spin back through a few generations, we might discover that our difficulties today are only reprints of difficulties which assailed other men in times past.

A writer in the "Business Conditions Weekly," of New York, recently set out to collect a few of the doleful outcries which former depressions have drawn from discouraged men.

As far back as the time of St. Augustine, 1700 years ago, he finds a writer complaining that agriculture was decaying, purchasing power was dwindling, taxes were soaring, and commerce was collapsing; the conclusion drawn, of course, was that the world was going to the dogs for good.

He finds a distinguished French physician in 1832 voicing similar complaints, lamenting the turmoil and confusion of the times—he had seen a post chaise rattling along at five miles an hour, and he said that "this madness of speed is wearing out men"—and he felt that his newly-born son faced a life which could bring him neither prosperity nor happiness.

He finds an American editor in 1857 describing the "universal commercial prostration and panic" about him, and remarking that "it is a gloomy moment in history . . . never has the future seemed so incalculable."

In 1856 a U. S. official speaks of the depression, doubts that any revival can come up to the level of the preceding 50 years, and concludes plaintively that "the day of large profits is probably past."

It is really worth our while to mull over the dismal Jeremiahs from the past. To be sure, it doesn't make our present problems any less difficult; but it may help us to see that a troubled time such as the present is never quite as dark and hopeless as the people who are living through it often suppose.

Historians 50 years hence will probably find some of our current fears just as quaintly humorous as those of former days seem to us now.

MEDICINE'S NEXT GOAL.

IF you would like to know what maladies constitute the greatest challenge to medical science today, you might consult the statistics just issued by the United States Census Bureau.

Studying and classifying the causes of the 1,342,074 deaths in the United States in 1933, the bureau reveals that heart disease is the principal cause of death, with cancer next and apoplexy third, followed closely by Bright's disease and pneumonia.

It is in the field covered by these ailments, then, that the greatest possibilities for medical triumphs are to be found. A sweeping blow at any of them comparable to the blows already struck at diphtheria, typhoid fever, and pernicious anemia, for instance, would be of stupendous importance to the race.

And while no such triumph is to be expected immediately, it is worth remembering that some of the finest brains in medical science are being devoted to a preparation for it.

A "TOUGH KID" CRIES.

THERE is something both humorous and grimly appalling about the story of that 3-year-old New York boy who was arrested with a burglar's kit in his possession and was accused of breaking into a store.

This lad talked the lingo of gangland. He told the police, "Gimme the works—it won't do you no good." They gave him ice cream, instead of the works, and he said: "I'm tough, and I don't go for that squealing stuff."

When he succeeded in getting the police off on a false trail, he chortled, "That was just a run-around for you guys."

Finally, to be sure, they brought in the young tough's mother, and he broke down and wept like any other kid in a jam.

But his juvenile bravado, his very obvious effort to pattern himself after the desperadoes of the underworld—don't they constitute a terrifying indictment of the kind of material some children are given for models, these days?

DOWN TO BUSINESS.

THE ambitious production program announced for next year by Henry Ford seems to foreshadow a pretty healthy revival in the important automobile industry generally. It also looks like the actual beginning of the long-awaited pickup in the capital goods industries.

For this program carries with it heavy expenditures on capital goods. Ford will spend $150,000,000 on steel to the open market; he will put $100,000,000 into the production of bodies, and $22,500,000 into the rubber industry.

Now it is pretty certain that Ford is not going to go it alone on a program of this kind. If he spends at this rate, other auto companies will do likewise.

The result will be an extremely helpful stimulation of some of the great, basic industries without whose recovery we cannot regain a real prosperity.

Experiments in feeding have convinced certain specialists that children know what to eat better than their parents. Market advice: sell spinach.

There are more private yachts than ever before, says an official report. So that's where prosperity went!

President Roosevelt took in the motor code for an overhauling and greased it up for winter operation.

WASHINGTON LETTER

By RODNEY DUTCHER

WASHINGTON, Nov. 10.—One thing you didn't hear about in this fall's political campaign was the battle of mimeographs between the Republican and Democratic publicity staffs.

The answer to that is that, although the battle raged, it didn't make any difference. Nobody paid any attention.

After 1930, the theory was widely accepted that Mr. Charles Michelson, the veteran correspondent whom the Democrats had hired—with Mr. Haskob's money—to "smear Hoover" was more than anyone else responsible for the Democratic congressional victory which signaled the complete victory of 1932.

The Republicans, meanwhile, had got themselves an able press agent and for two or three years the thousands of statements the two press agents hurled at each other were considered a vital new development in politics which assumed almost the importance of the campaigns themselves.

But Mr. Michelson, who is now a close counselor to Jim Farley and Emil Hurja, took the cream off the political press agenting business, which won't flourish again until the country is ripe for a change.

Good When You Win

A political press agent is a big success when he rides a winning horse and almost no use at all with a loser.

As the depression deepened and the country turned against Hoover, Democrats had a much easier time cashing in because Mr. Michelson had been so industriously turning out statements of the politicians which could be used in an "I-told-you-so" refrain.

Of course, Mr. Roosevelt was really the one who cashed in—heavy on the money of his enemy, Mr. Haskob, and the efforts of his enemy, Mr. J. M. Shouse, who had employed Mr. Michelson.

This year the Republicans hired another able newspaperman, Warren Wheaton, who turned out reams of "hot copy" against the Democrats, who largely contented themselves with mimeographing innumerable inspirational speeches by Farley.

"Smearing" Is Flop

Attempts to "smear" the Democratic use of federal funds as a campaign chest, to expose Farley's political trickery and the president's graying of the Guffey campaign in Pennsylvania fell rather flat.

Republicans felt much as Democrats felt in 1924 and 1928 when they tried to stir the voters to wrath against the Coolidge regime by recitations of Teapot Dome and other scandals.

The voters seemed as full of hope in Roosevelt and the New Deal bounties as once they were in Coolidge prosperity. The Republicans had nothing to offer except a good press agent, which was far from being enough.

Farley Covers Up

If everybody had been looking for a chance to pick on the administration, the press agency would have been a big help. And it's too bad more of the G. O. P. razzberries didn't get into circulation.

The mimeographed saga of Farley and his "dumb stenographers" was as amusing a thing as appeared in a relatively dumb campaign. Some gifted gent dug up and presented a veritable train of attempts by Farley to cover up his bluffs—ending up with the Upton Sinclair fiasco—by blaming clerical errors.

The bankers didn't know it, but the nice, fresh, close haired Roosevelt wore the night he addressed them had been acquired that very day in his honor.

Repair work on the Washington Monument is being slowed up because government engineers are so busy keeping people off the workmen's elevator, which goes clear to the top with an outside view, whereas the passenger elevator rises but 500 feet.

Nathan, ace sleuth who as assistant director of the Justice Department's Bureau of Investigation guided the Stoll kidnapping manhunt, became lost in the new Justice building and had to be led back to his office by a messenger.

T. Webber Wilson was once as great a sensation around here as Bilbo himself.

Back in 1927, Congressman Wilson was creating no end of commotion by shrill demands that the government censor all magazines before publication.

He had a bill providing for a National Board of Magazine Censorship and any publisher who failed to submit a copy before issuance would have been liable to 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine.

Mr. Wilson had been finding "snuff" in the periodicals and one of the serial stories he objected to was Ernest Hemingway's "Farewell to Arms."

Of course the bill never got anywhere and neither did Mr. Wilson, despite his carefully cultivated reputation for righteousness.

Next year he, too, ran for the Senate and was no more heard of here until it was recently found that Harrison had him down in the Virgin Islands. He is still a relatively young man and may yet have a future as brilliant as Bilbo's.

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

By DR. MORRIS FISHER

Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygiene, the Health Magazine

MOST of the iron in your body is found in the blood. It is there as part of the hemoglobin in the red blood cells. Its purpose is to help the red blood cells carry oxygen.

Iron also is found in muscles, liver, spleen, and kidneys. However, the total amount of iron in your body is not great.

There are various ways in which the blood is badly affected in relationship to the iron that it contains. In some cases an insufficient amount of iron is being supplied by the diet to replace the daily loss of iron from the body.

In other cases, due to a large hemorrhage, considerable amounts of iron associated with the red blood cells may be lost from the body.

Therefore, in cases of anemia due to bad diet or to the loss of blood through hemorrhage, the feeding of extra iron in the diet is a useful measure.

It has been estimated by various authorities that anywhere from six to sixteen thousandths of a gram of iron are lost from the body daily, and that therefore every person ought to take in an extra 15 milligrams, or 15-100ths of a gram, of iron each day, to make up the loss and allow something as a factor of safety.

Food varies as to its content of iron. Lean meat furnishes considerable iron and if taken once daily will help make up the iron loss.

An egg yields about 1-10th of all the iron needed by the body. Dried fruits are a good source of iron. Among the leafy vegetables, parsley contains most iron, but is seldom eaten as such.

The green leafy vegetables, such as spinach and leaf lettuce, contain more iron than celery, cabbage and head lettuce.

Milk, which has been called the most nearly perfect food, contains about 1 1/2 milligrams of iron in a pint which is less than 1-10th of all the iron required by the body daily.

A growing child requires more iron than does an adult. When children are born, they have a small reserve store of iron in the body.

This is gradually used up, however, so that children occasionally develop a form of nutritional anemia which is an indication for the provision of extra iron.

A woman who is about to give birth to a child needs extra iron to take care of the needs of the baby, and the woman also requires extra iron at such times as she may be undergoing loss of blood through her periodic functions.
