RIISING MARKET SYMPTOMS.

THERE is a rumbling noise in the stock markets these days, and it all sounds very much like the machinery of an old-fashioned boom picking up speed to swing into high. And that, in turn, leads one to wonder if we could be on the verge of repeating the joy ride which ended up against a safety zone station in October, 1929.

A stock market boom in itself need not do much harm to anyone who has the good sense to keep his fingers away from the hot end of the poker. It is only if we begin to look on stock quotations as the one great sign of national prosperity, and assume that a bubbling stock market is prosperity itself, that the joy ride will really be under way.

That was what we did back in the glamorous twenties. The stock market was our answer to everything, in those days. If anybody suggested that technological unemployment was becoming a grave problem, that our agriculture was critically ill, that our foreign trade was being erected on a basis of borrowed money, that we were losing sight of all human values in our race for riches—well, the one big answer to everything was that stock prices were "way up" and that anyone who didn't like it would best go back to Moscow, where he came from.

We can repeat that program if we choose. All ingredients for a stock market boom seem to be at hand—including the cheerful presence of Major Angus.

But we might as well remember that on our last joy ride we not only wrecked the automobile, but came uncomfortably close to breaking our own necks.

The danger lies in the chance that we may again mistake a rising stock market for an end in itself rather than a symptom. A rising market does not bring prosperity. Prosperity brings a rising market.

EDUCATING THE BIG CITY.

THERE is something rather melancholy about this stunt by which a portable "barn" with an assortment of farm animals is being transported about in New York City so that children from the pavements can get an idea of what cows, sheep, and barnyard fowl really look like.

Living in a city offers many advantages, of course; but this stunt does emphasize some of the disadvantages which arise when city life is made too confining.

A child brought up under circumstances which keep it ignorant of the simplest of facts about rural life, so that it won't even know what a cow looks like unless someone lugs one around and exhibits it—such a child simply isn't getting a fair start in life.

Of course, there's nothing especially inspiring about the sight of a cow. But city pavements make a poor substitute for grassy meadows, and the mere fact that this portable barn arrangement is making such a stir speaks volumes about the artificial condition under which some city children live.

LIKE GOOD OLD DAYS!

STUDYING the news from Europe, one is almost persuaded sometimes that a grim and implacable fate is at work, compelling men to duplicate the costly errors of former days.

One of the most recent dispatches from overseas told how Great Britain has at last begun a race to match Germany's expansion of her air force. Production has been speeded up, plane and engine manufacturers have been forbidden to accept foreign orders, and a new defense program is to be presented to the House of Commons.

Given the present state of international politics, it is hard to see what else the British can do; and yet—is not the whole thing horribly like the Anglo-German naval race of pre-war days?

That competition paved the way for a war that almost wrecked both nations. Will the new competition in aerial fleets have the same results?

Denmark provides government protection against unemployment and old age, says news item. But maybe the Danish court decided to marry Barbara just in case.

Hollywood couple has just completed 25 years of married life. If America wants to show England a thing or two about throwing jubilees, there's the excuse.

Families who will eventually want to send them through college are given only the brighter babies to adopt, says humane society director. In this gridiron era, we can't see the connection.

Gertrude Stein says she is "married to America." What she was pouring into our ears during her recent visit, it seems, must have been sweet nothings.

Here's a possible solution. Out of their profits, let the telegraph companies chip in and say the bonus.

New York police are seeking culprit who wrecked theater. Evidently a man who lacked self-control when someone climbed over his knees.

WASHINGTON LETTER

By RODNEY DUTCHER
 (Register-Guard Washington Correspondent)
 WASHINGTON, May 25.—The fight over the banking act of 1933, like those over most of the other proposals on President Roosevelt's "must" program, centers on a New Deal demand for greater public control in the American economic system.

Mr. Roosevelt and Gov. Marriner S. E. Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board say, in effect: "We cannot afford to trust private bankers any more with the management of our national credit and financial policies."

The bankers reply: "We cannot afford to trust the politicians."

The house already has passed the bill, on the theory that it is safer to trust a governmental agency, representing—and accountable to—the people, than the bankers, representing—and accountable to—themselves.

The Senate Banking Committee is now considering the bill, plus certain amendments urged by Eccles which it probably will adopt.

Step Toward Central Bank

The administration steps well short of Father Coughlin's demand for a new government-owned central bank to absorb the 12 Federal Reserve banks with absolute power over currency, credit, and banking—including issuance of all money and regulation of its value.

(Secretary Morgenthau's proposal to buy up the stock of the Federal Reserve banks is at present to be taken as a threat to bankers that they may get a more radical bill if they persist in opposition.)

But it takes a vigorous step toward the central bank idea in its proposal to remove control of open market operations from the 12 Federal Reserve bank governors, representing private bankers, and give it—with power to initiate and enforce—to the presidentially appointed Federal Reserve Board, which now has only a veto power over those operations.

Open market operations are simply those in which the 12 regional Federal Reserve banks deal in government bonds with the thousands of member banks of the Federal Reserve System. Purchase by the reserve banks increases bank reserves, providing member banks with more funds. Sale to member banks decreases their reserves.

Boom Can Be Curbed

The theory is that credit expands when reserves are increased and that recovery follows whenever business is willing to borrow. But if a dangerous speculative boom threatens, regional banks can sell bonds to member banks in order to withdraw funds from the market.

Under the banking bill, the Federal Reserve Board could also make credit either more or less expensive through changing the discount rate (interest rate charged by Federal Reserve banks for loans to member banks, which controls rate charged by the latter to customers) or more or less plentiful by changing reserve requirements.

Restraint of such control on a presidentially appointed board is opposed by Senator Carter Glass, the American Bankers' Association, the U. S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Liberty League, and others.

Bankers Want Control

The A. B. A. urges an open market committee of a five-member Federal Reserve Board plus four rotating Federal Reserve bank governors, presumably on the theory that the banker members could work comfortably with at least one of the board members and thus exert control.

Eccles would have a committee of five governors acting only in an advisory capacity. As a trading point and to meet the charge of "political control," he would be willing to have the secretary of the treasury and the controller of the currency removed from their present ex-officio positions on the board.

The argument against "political control" is that an administration might make its political fortunes the chief guiding factor in the open market committee's operations.

It is also argued that the bill confers power for inflation which might be used recklessly. To which administration forces reply that Roosevelt—under the Thomas amendment and other measures—already has far more powers to inflate than he wants to use.

Who'll Check on Whom?

Bankers also complain that the government is given the power to compel bankers to buy its bonds, whether or not they deem it gully of unsound financing.

It is admitted that the administration doesn't want to leave bankers in a position where they can refuse to lend it money whenever they desire. Thus the issue becomes one of whether the government should have a check on the bankers or vice versa.

Both sides draw from 1927-29 history to demonstrate that either the bankers or the Federal Reserve Board is likely to be the less trustworthy. But the Eccles measure is only one more step toward federal control of banking.

Previous ones include RFC purchase of $1,000,000,000 in preferred bank stock, bank deposit insurance—carrying with it closer federal supervision and more unification of the banking system, and gold devaluation in which control of gold was transferred from the Federal Reserve System to treasury.

Other Powers Granted

Other provisions of the administration measure—some of which also extend public control—include establishment of permanent insurance of bank deposits up to $5,000, approval of Reserve Bank governors by the F. R. B., broadening of collateral requirements to extend discount privileges to all sound assets approved by F. R. B., power for the F. R. B. to approve long-term loans on real estate up to 60 per cent of value, raising salaries of board members from $12,000 to $15,000—and under an Eccles proposal designed to increase the board's independence—pensions for board members.

Although many question whether either private bankers or a Federal Reserve Board would have the courage to put on the brakes in case of a speculative boom—and that's a chief professed aim of the administration—there's little question that the legislation congress will pass will give the president much greater power over banking.

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

By DR. MORRIS FISHER
 (Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygiene, the Health Magazine)

THE saying that a mother loses a tooth for every child that she bears has been quoted down through the years until it seems to have acquired almost universal belief.

It was developed, of course, in the day when we did not know very much about relationship of calcium in the diet to teeth, when there was no understanding of the importance of having a sufficient amount of vitamin D to permit proper use of calcium and phosphorus by the body, and when we did not know that the glands had any special relationship to this factor.

There still seems to be some argument on the subject. The idea that calcium is drained out of the mother's body by the needs of the prospective child is supported by a considerable amount of references in scientific medical and dental literature.

Yet a writer for the American Dental Association insists that there is no acceptable evidence that pregnant women show a greater incidence of decay of the teeth than non-pregnant women of the same age.

Furthermore, it is said that decay of the teeth is not definitely related to the difficulty of handling calcium by the body, and that there is no way to prove whether calcium is taken out of the teeth by the process of pregnancy.

It is believed that the new knowledge of calcium to which I have referred was seized upon by men who have no real understanding what happens to the teeth of many women during this period.

Of course, we do not yet know definitely the cause of the condition called dental caries. There are, however, a dozen or more theories. Whenever this number of theories is available on any subject, it is reasonable to believe that none of them is likely to be correct.

The factors involved are numerous and certainly complex. Two children in the same family on the same diet may exhibit different reactions—one developing dental decay and the other failing to develop the condition.

This does not mean that the research that has been done on this condition has been wasted. The history of medicine in recent years shows quite definitely that each of these new discoveries is the result of discoveries that have gone before.

Accumulated evidence from various branches of medical science has yielded the solution to such problems as diabetes, pernicious anemia, Addison's disease, and most of the other conditions which were formerly invariably fatal, but which are now subject to medical control.
