

HOPE OF STRIKE SETTLEMENT AT WESTFIR HINTED

While no tangible steps had been taken, prospects of a settlement of the Westfir lumber strike were believed Friday in statements issued by leaders of the striking workmen that they were willing to go back to work if company officials would grant union recognition.

This one point is all that remains to effect a settlement, it was revealed Friday when Laurence Reynolds, president of the Sawmill and Timber Workers union, said the union was willing to accept the company's proposal of a 50-cent minimum wage with an increase from five to ten cents in the upper brackets, if union recognition also would be granted.

"This does not mean a closed shop, but simply means that union labor would be hired where available and that the union would be recognized as the bargaining organization of labor," Reynolds said.

Earl Downing, manager of the Western Lumber company mill, could not be reached for a statement Friday or for questioning as to whether there was any likelihood of the company's being willing to grant union recognition.

The mill at Westfir did not operate Thursday or Friday, though no one could give the reason for the shut-down Friday. Members of the mill staff said there were sufficient logs in the pond to run the mill while officials of the union said no logs were being taken out of the woods.

About 50 men are at present in the woods, the regular crew consisting of 120 men. Most of the strike breakers are said to leave their jobs when they learn a strike condition prevails.

Following settlement of the strike at the Pacific Cooperative Poultry Producers' plant here, no definite action was taken by members of the association at their meeting at the chamber of commerce Thursday evening. Kenneth Nielsen, president, explained the issues involved in the strike and outlined the negotiations which led to its settlement. It had been planned to adopt a resolution opposing or favoring the strike, but this was not considered necessary after the employees went back to work.

ministrative officer, as it did under NRA where bureaus issued orders which became the law of the land.

Modifications are Predicted

The stand of the court on interstate commerce will be modified in the years to come, Dean Morse believes, because business now is a national affair.

In comparing the American conception of constitutional government with the British ideas, Dean Morse pointed out that in England the parliament is supreme, the courts only having the power to pass on administrative acts of officers, while in America the court actually is supreme to the congress in determining whether certain acts are constitutional.

In England administrative law is given more prominence, politics is definitely a profession and the more efficient system of law drafting prevails under the legislative drafting bureaus in existence, he said. Under these three elements, the British system of parliamentary supremacy is successful, but if such a policy were to be accepted in America, it would fall unless these three elements were injected into American government.

Supreme Court Safeguards

"I believe the policy of giving the supreme court the power it enjoys in the United States is a safe policy because it has been conclusively shown that legislative bodies are subject to being swayed by opinion," Dean Morse declared.

The speaker emphasized three proposals in relation to the supreme court which are likely to be dominant political issues in America in the near future: 1—requiring the court to set up a constitutional law department to give out advisory opinions on major legislation to prevent the waste of the present system; 2—requiring unanimous decisions to declare an act unconstitutional; and 3—giving congress a veto power over the decisions of the supreme court.

The latter proposal, known as the LaFollette proposal, means the establishment of parliamentary supremacy in America and in passing an opinion on this proposal he urged that the situation which makes the British plan a success be taken into consideration.

Miss Reid in her address cited the dangers of radical movements brought about by the unsatisfactory and distorted existence the young people face at the present time. "We are being graduated into a world in which we are not wanted," she said. "Our ideals seem threatened with never being completed, yet we are told that this shattering of our dreams is a part of our bringing up." Miss Reid was at a loss to know why the older generations teach the young people that war is terrible and a racket, yet they continue to indulge in it. She declared it to be a "maddening mystery." She concluded by saying that "war is inevitable so long as it is profitable, so the young people have declared war against ignorance."

HERE is the PLAN

for Extra Water for Your Lawn

- (1) The amount charged you for water under this plan will not be more than the amount for the corresponding month last year, at the address where you now reside. The date at your address will be from the June meter reading and you may have the extra water for three months after the dates shown for these streets.
- (2) If your bill this year does not amount to as much as you used last year, you will be billed on this year's meter reading.
- (3) If there was no water used last year at the address where you now live, you will be allowed the extra water after you have used an amount of $1.66. (There is an exception to this in the Victoria Heights district).
- (4) Outside-the-City customers may use the water the same as those inside the city.
- (5) The plan shall apply only to lawns, shrubbery, and flowers, in connection with residences and apartment houses, and in a reasonable amount only, to home vegetable gardens where the garden use cannot be separated from the other use. It will not apply to neighboring premises, to public parks, public buildings, schools, commercial gardens, or commercial and industrial establishments.
- (6) Any customer eligible (under the rating in Sec. 5) may participate in this plan.
- (7) The Water Board reserves the right to withdraw the entire plan in case the water system becomes overloaded, or, if for any reason the plan proves impractical. All citizens are requested to give hearty cooperation in a manner that will give the best results in beautifying our city.
- (8) If you have dry brown spots in your lawn, the answer is either fertilizer, or perhaps—lime, to sweeten the soil. Too much water will sour the soil and make your lawn brown. Lawns must have food as well as drink.
- (9) It is not necessary to make application as the plan is automatically effective for all eligible users.
