

SCIENTISTS THRILL OVER DISCOVERY OF MUMMY IN CAVE

MAMMOTH CAVE, Ky., June 21.—(AP)—From the mummified body of a lone miner, crushed long ago in a rock fall, scientists hoped today to gather clues as to the habits, learning and food of the people who inhabited America before Columbus came.

Crude tools indicate, from hasty study that a man whose body was found recently, according to Robert P. Holland, acting representative of the national park service in charge of the park, far back in Mammoth cave, died there some 500 years ago. Why he crawled into the cavern and what he dug for remain to be discovered.

Alonso W. Pond, national park service archaeologist, and Louis Shellbach, assistant chief of the N. P. S. museum, said that if research realizes the possibilities suggested by the find, it might prove a valuable clue to early life in this country. By rail and air they hurried here when advised of the find. They are not ready to give opinions yet, but from their unofficial observations, this story may be reconstructed:

Before Columbus discovered America the prehistoric miner put away his terror of evil spirits and crawled four miles in Mammoth cave's blackness, with rocks for a torch. Under a five-ton rock he lay and dug, as hundreds of his race had, with what rocks came to hand.

His blows loosed the rock. He sensed its fall, drew up his legs to leap. He was not quick enough. The rock crunched down, topped him in midleap, jerked his elbow from its socket, snapped off his forearm, dislocated his shoulder.

He was pinned four centuries. The cave's nitrogen and steady temperature dried him where he died, so that today he is still in midleap and looks apt to complete it at any moment.

Pond and Shellbach pointed to thousands of nicks in the limestone, made with crude handpicks. Rotten sandstone had been dug out far back under the limestone. Pond said these argued that many Indians dug as the miner did.

TROUBLE ZONE IN CHINA!

Reports that Japan is pouring troops into North China strengthen the belief that Nippon's long-anticipated program to extend the influence of Manchukuo is getting underway and will not halt until that portion of China between the Great Wall and the Yellow River, if not still further westward, has been brought under Manchukuan sway. This the way would be opened for restoring Henry Pu Yi, left, Manchukuan ruler and former "boy emperor" of China to the ancestral throne in Peiping which he abdicated in 1912, and for the extension of his domain, under Japanese influence, to all of eastern Inner Mongolia in addition to North China. Japan's failure to achieve economic domination in North China is regarded as responsible for the current campaign. The map shows how Japan's expansionist policies have already embraced Manchukuo and Jehol, and indicates the territory toward which Nippon's eyes now are turned.
