Painful Piles

Quick—No Cutting—No Salves
Take only one bottle of Dr. J. C. Hendershott's prescription—HEM-ROID—relieve itching, bleeding or painful piles. This internal medicine quickly even in old stubborn piles. HEM-ROID succeeds because it acts on the lower bowel—the cause of the trouble. Only an internal medicine can do this. That's why salves and ointments fail. Penny Wise Cut HEM-ROID Tablets say one of your year-Pile misery or your back.

One sister, Mrs. B. W. Holman of Bishop, Cal., is en route to Monroe.

Funeral services will be held at 2 o'clock Friday in the Methodist church of Monroe, with burial at Alpine cemetery. Rev. Parker of Nehalem, former pastor of Monroe, officiated.

FOREST BULLETIN DESCRIBES DETROIT RECREATIONAL AREA

One of the largest burns in the northwest greets the tourist's eye as he motors along the Mill City road enroute to the Detroit-Breitenbush recreation area in the Santiam country. Before reaching Mill City, after leaving Salem, this burn is encountered, thousands of acres having been denuded by fire.

After having this vivid lesson of the result of man's carelessness with fire impressed upon him, the tourist enters the beautiful North Santiam area, going up the Santiam canyon with its towering mountains and sheer walls of rock from which the road has been blasted in many places.

The following information on this recreational area has been compiled by the Willamette national forest. How to Get There: Leave the Pacific Highway (U.S. 99) at Salem, Eastward through Stayton and Mill City to Detroit over hard surfaced or gravel highway. (Turn north at Mehamn for Elkhorn and Little North Fork country). Your visit to this area may be made a portion of a loop trip from Portland by following the Breitenbush Road through the Breitenbush and Olallie Lakes and on north over a good summer road joining the Mt. Hood Loop on the south side of Mt. Hood.

Along the Highway: Before reaching Mill City, the traveler begins to catch glimpses of the ghost forest that is the outstanding feature of the country ahead. As far as Detroit and on beyond, thousands of acres have been denuded by fire. The millions of dead trees once a primeval forest now stand a mute evidence of man's carelessness with fire. These "snags" are a serious fire menace to the fine stand of young growth which has caught a foothold over most of the area. They are decaying and beginning to fall, making travel somewhat uncertain during the stormy seasons.

Despite the snags, the trip up the canyon of the North Santiam River is one of rare beauty. From Niagara to Detroit, the mountains are very abrupt, rising thousands of feet on either side above the winding road which in places has been blasted from sheer rock. About half way between Niagara and Detroit, the traveler enters the Willamette National Forest. Considerable privately owned land will be found within the limits of the National Forest boundary, particularly along the main routes of travel. Most of this land has been logged over. Upon entering the National Forest, it will be noticed that the snags have been cut on many of the wind-swept ridges and points. This is a fire prevention measure. High winds carry fire embers long distances. Should they lodge on one of the snags, a new fire is quickly started. This expensive and laborious precaution is taken because of the huge tract of virgin timber on the headwaters of the drainage which will furnish logs for future logging industries.

Forest Ranger Station: One-half mile west of Detroit along the highway. Here the tourist may obtain campfire permits and general information concerning camping, hiking, fishing, summer homes, etc. If you camp at a designated forest camp, no campfire permit is required.

The Forest Ranger at Detroit is in charge of one of the five ranger districts in the Willamette National Forest. His territory covers 375,000 acres of standing timber. At the conservative figure of $1.00 per thousand board feet, the timber is worth $3,750,000. To say nothing of the recreational value, fish and game refuge, flood and erosion control and influence on climate. In order to grasp the tremendous volume of this amount of timber, let us suppose it were all to be cut into lumber. It would build 667,000 modern seven-room homes which, if placed on ordinary 50-foot lots, would make a row of houses 6,300 miles long.

Two interesting trips for hikers and mountain climbers may be made from Detroit. One leads up to Hoover Point Lookout over a good forest trail which leaves the highway one-half mile east of Detroit. Distance one mile. This lookout affords a splendid view of the surrounding country. The other is a five-mile hike up a trail, which leaves the highway one mile west of Detroit, to Dome Rock and Tumble Lake. The foot of the trail is about 1400 feet elevation and Dome Rock is 4843 feet. Tumble Lake, one mile from the lookout, has a setting of rare beauty.

Detroit is the gateway to two major recreational units. One is the North Santiam-Hog Pass Area. The other is the following described area: Detroit-Breitenbush Area: The Breitenbush-Olallie Lake Road starting from Detroit and follows the Breitenbush River for a distance of about twenty miles before it crosses the divide and enters the Mt. Hood National Forest.

The Breitenbush River is too rough for motor or row boat. Good fly fishing—resides and cutthroat trout. Best results usually with red and blue uplight, grey hackle and flying caddis flies. Water clear and cold. Fishermen's trail along the shore affords wonderful chances for hiking and photography.

Humburg Forest Camp: Elevation 1800 feet. Six miles above Detroit on Breitenbush Road. This camp may be used as the base for fishing, hiking, hunting, picnicking and berry picking in season.

Eagle Rock Lookout: Eagle Rock Lookout is easily accessible by a two-mile trail which leaves the Breitenbush Road two miles above Humburg Camp.

Elk Lake Forest Camp: On Elk Lake, 3700 feet elevation. Five miles north of Humburg Camp on Elk Lake Road. This camp may be used as base for several splendid hikes in the higher country.

Battle Axe Lookout: Elevation 3547 feet. A difficult two-mile climb from the camp. Provides scenic view of snow-capped peaks, broad expanse of timber, color and life on the one hand; on the other, waste, devastation and death, the result of man's carelessness with fire in the forest.

RINGERS PLAY HERE SUNDAY!

The Mason bell ringers and triple chimes players of California, above, will give a sacred concert in Eugene Sunday evening at 7:30 o'clock at the First Christian church as the feature for the weekly union church services. They play varied instruments.

and booming waterfalls all centered around Mt. Jefferson, an extinct volcano 10,500 feet in height, rugged and steep, offering exceptional opportunity to mountain climbers. 80,700 acres have been set aside to be preserved as nature gave it to us. No summer homes or developments of any kind, other than primitive rustic shelters and camps are permitted within its borders. It is to be preserved for future generations where the lover of nature can always get entirely away from civilization and find a place to re-create himself in God's great outdoors.

PLANNER VISIONS GREATER EUGENE

chamber of commerce. Prescott outlined the five major steps in the proposal which would re-route the Willamette river in east Eugene, provide for a through arterial highway for heavy freight, and transfer the tracks of the Southern Pacific highway to the north bank of the Willamette river.

These five major points in the gigantic proposal, which will soon be sent to the state planning commission for final approval, in the order of their projected completion, are:

1. The dredging and revention of the Willamette river from Ferry street bridge to Judd's Point, so as to straighten the channel of the river and minimize the flood hazard;
2. The removal of the tracks of the Southern Pacific railroad from their present location paralleling the Pacific highway to the northern banks of the re-directed Willamette;
3. The creation of a heavy traffic highway paralleling the new railroad tracks, to accommodate trucks and other through traffic;
4. The erection of a super-crossing at the north end of High street;
5. The construction of an under-crossing at Judd's Point.

H. E. Cully, manager of the chamber of commerce.
