MORSE DISCUSSES JUDICIAL REVIEW

usually alleged in support of this sense of the rule do none of them prove that where the main subject of a statute is unreasonable the judges are at liberty to reject it, for that were to set the judicial power above that of a legislature which would be subversive to all government.

However, Parliamentary supremacy in England does not mean that the acts of Parliament are not subject to judicial interpretation, but it does mean that the English Parliament is supreme in that it has final authority to determine the validity of laws.

It remains for the courts to interpret and administer the laws. When legislative acts are not clear on their face as to the meaning intended by Parliament, the courts so far as possible interpret the act in terms of common law principles.

The English doctrine of parliamentary supremacy has led to three noticeable trends in England, as I view the situation.

In the first place, English statutes are very carefully drawn and considered before enactment. As early as 1860 the department of Parliamentary counsel was created, charged with the responsibility of preparing government bills for all the government departments of England. This department serves as a legislative drafting bureau for Parliament and was the forerunner and model for legislative drafting bureaus which have been set up by several states in this country.

In the second place, Parliament, by general enactments, has delegated large powers of a legislative nature to ministers and commissions of the government. These English ministers and commissioners for a long time have served as the "brain trust" of Parliament and around them has grown up a large body of regulation and orders, or administrative law, comprising their rules, regulations and orders.

The great growth of administrative law in the United States during the last ten years has a long-accepted counterpart in England and English experience does not justify many of the fears of those who protest the growth of administrative law in this country.

In the third place, the fact of parliamentary supremacy has helped to make politics a learned profession in England with the result that many young Englishmen openly select politics as a career and train themselves for parliamentary service.

When we contrast that attitude with the typical American view of political life, we can understand better the reasons for placing final reliance upon our courts when it comes to protecting our constitutional rights.
