CRUMBAKER SHOWS COMMERCE TRENDS

of naturalization, cannot migrate, as a citizen, whenever it chooses, and demand in the place to which it moves the full rights of citizens and the equal protection of the laws.

Being a person created by law, it has a legal standing only in the state creating it, or in such states as shall by comity, or otherwise, through legislative action, recognize its personality.

The attempts of corporations to circumvent the power of a state to exclude them from operation in the state has led to some fine distinctions between interstate and intrastate commerce.

Under the Constitution the state cannot prevent a corporation from carrying out interstate business in the state. A state cannot in any way obstruct or burden interstate commerce, regardless of whether it is carried on by a natural person or by a corporation having legal existence only in some other state.

Where State May Act

On the other hand, a state can prevent any foreign corporation from carrying on intrastate commerce of any kind whatsoever. The decision on some of these disputes will go far in helping decide what Congress can and cannot do.

In one case a tea company sent its solicitors throughout a state to receive orders for its products. It had no right to do intrastate business. It could sell its products by the carload through the personal solicitation of agents so long as it filled the orders from outside the state.

One salesman, finding a sample box or two of toilet cream left over, sold and delivered them to a customer. He was promptly fined for doing business without a city license. The case was taken through all the courts until finally the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the verdict.

A deal of trouble over two cans of toilet cream, to be sure, but not too much trouble to define a basic law. Both the salesman and the corporation were guilty of doing intrastate business without proper authority from the state. Carloads of toilet cream could be sold in the state by the same persons by following the rules applying to interstate commerce.

Balance is Rather Delicate

The balance between interstate and intrastate commerce is delicate as you get closer to the boundary line.

A corporation may actually set up an office within a state and maintain it as headquarters for salesmen and a repository for samples without engaging in intrastate commerce in spite of state laws declaring this to be doing business in the state.

Such a corporation lays itself liable to severe penalties if it gives evidence, by inadvertent acts, that it is doing business in the state. It must not maintain a local bank account, deliver repair parts out of stock, sell and deliver a sample, confirm an order, accept a payment on account, or do many other simple acts which could be construed as maintaining a place of business.

Portland discovered that though agents of Real Silk hosiery and agents for Curtis publications were local residents who solicited orders and accepted payments, they were doing interstate business for the reason that all shipments were from out of the state. A state cannot enforce laws against a foreign corporation which does nothing but interstate commerce within the state.

Usually keeping goods in a warehouse for delivery upon order, even where the order is confirmed out of the state, has been ruled to be doing business in the state and subject to the regulation of the state. This might put such business beyond the control of Congress under the interstate commerce powers.

In some cases states have denied the right of a corporation making conditional sales contract from enforcing collections in state courts for the reason that the corporation was illegally doing business within the state.

On the other hand, if a corporation consigns goods to a commission merchant who takes full responsibility for sales and delivery, he is doing business in the state while the corporation owning the goods is not. The commission merchant may be a natural person, a partnership, or a domestic corporation. If the consignee were an "agent" of the out-of-state corporation it may be assumed that the court would rule that the corporation, not the agent, was doing business in the state.

For a long time past states were anxious to extend their jurisdiction over corporations aspiring to do business in the state. In general popular opinion favored the extension of such authority.

Today when so much dependence is put in national legislation as an aid to recovery these precedents are very troublesome, especially since the court has shown the tendency to follow the constitutional restrictions against interference by either Congress or state legislation in the respective jurisdiction of the other.

It has been pointed out that it was next to impossible for a corporation to carry on a nation-wide business without falling into the meshes of state law. Most of them found it necessary to make terms with the states in order to protect themselves against liability for unlawfully doing business in the state.

It is also next to impossible for Congress to pass a law of general ap-
