KEY TO MURDER?

Through the casual talk of a bright, handsome lad of 7, James Thompson Castle, upper right, Chicago police hope to find the clues that will trap the slayer of Mrs. Florence Thompson Castle, 24, lower left, night club hostess. The lad told police he awoke in his hotel home to see a "big black man" bating his mother with a brick and choking her. Police discounted as a clue the misspelled "Black Legion" scrawled on the mirror, which Capt. William O'Brien is examining, upper left. Sigmund Schaps, lower right, admitted admirer of the victim, was questioned, but detectives doubted he had any connection with the crime.

Fathers Are Interested In Children, Expert Assures Convention Women

SEATTLE, July 8.—(AP)—American Home Economics association delegates—mostly women—were assured today that fathers are greatly interested in their children and think about them. Lydia Ann Lynde of Michigan State college, urged that fathers be given a place in child development and parental education projects because "in spite of the rather general attitude of the average mother, fathers really are greatly interested in their children and do much for their growth, development and possible future." She concluded that because fathers are sometimes inarticulate about this side of their thinking, "there has been an assumption that they are not interested." But she warned that project leaders must "carefully gauge the material to be advanced and developed," when fathers, too, are included in the child development projects, because "men are not primarily interested in the little problems in the technique of handling children that distress mothers so much." Project leaders, Mrs. Lynde added, "must remember that our problem needs to be faced two ways—first to help fathers understand that they really have a part in the study of parenthood, and second, in presenting such material and opportunity for observation and contributions that fathers can feel they have a working part." About 2500 delegates are attending the sessions, which end Friday. Among other things, they heard today, through Evelyn H. Roberts, Washington State college, that research workers in Oregon and Washington, touring with a specially fitted automobile are busy measuring housewives' bodies and seeking to determine the best heights and other dimensions for kitchen sinks, table tops and chairs. "A statistical analysis is being made of possible correlations between certain body measurements and the selected heights for kitchen activities," she concluded.

Monkeying With Gold Franc Turns Out To Be France's White Elephant

By MORRIS GILBERT (NEA Staff Correspondent) PARIS, July 8.—In an atmosphere of terrific tension, amid rumors of impending calamity, the business of making political monkeys is booming in France. If his enemies are trying hard to take a fall out of Premier Leon Blum, his friends aren't doing so badly in returning the compliment. Most monkey-like of all is the vast throng of conservative politicians who, up to the time of Blum's arrival in power, were howling themselves black in the face in defense of the gold franc. The same is true of most of the big newspapers. Once Blum was in power, however, this same crowd began tempting apoplexy in the demand for devaluation. With one accord they have agreed, "Let Leon do it." The immortal principles of Pierre Laval and ancient Gaston Doumergue—for strict loyalty to the gold standard—are now priced at two for a sou and no takers. In other words, there's plenty of jack to be made on devaluation—it's Blum who'll take the responsibility. Faces Financial Dilemma Only two men, on the right side of the Chamber of Deputies, have been consistent. One is brilliant little Paul Reynaud, for years champion of devaluation; the other is Raymond Patenotre, who also has been preaching this gospel. Some people think that it will be Reynaud who will lead France into the green pastures of financial comfort some time soon—perhaps after the so-called predicted fascist state shall have succeeded to the present social thrust. Observers here generally agree that Leon Blum is on the spot. He must either deflate or devalue—both of which steps he has vigorously protested he would not take. Meanwhile, he has retorted sharply, through his finance minister, Yvon Delbos. He has pilloried the Laval-devalued-Bank of France procedure of deflation, by which French wages, French buying power, French financial stability, and French production have dried up like a desert spring in August. "This is what the fascist-capitalist mobsters have made of France," he says, in effect. "Take a good look." Hoard $3,000,000,000 Blaming the other fellow, however, doesn't help the immediate situation. What with panics, real and artificial calamity-howling, real menaces, increased production costs through strikers' demands, the force of circumstances is trying hard to monkey-ify Leon Blum. His answer, to date, has produced little beyond head-shaking. To restore the buying power of the masses is the familiar keystone of France's New Deal. Many of the plans now functioning in the United States—big public works ventures to relieve unemployment, raising wages, reducing hours, pensioning elder workers—are on the carpet here, with one exception. The People's Front government thinks it can get along without going off the gold standard. How long it can continue to think this, nobody knows. In paper money alone it is estimated that Frenchmen have hoarded up to three billion dollars worth of francs. Uncover Peasant Hoards One proposal is to organize a government loan on such inviting terms that nobody could resist. The terms would be, say, interest at 2½ per cent—which is just 2½ per cent more than that money is now earning, guaranteed bonds callable at any moment at the will of the holder. Such bonds would be practically equivalent to currency. Another proposal is slicker. It is simply to withdraw all outstanding French banknotes and to replace them with other banknotes having a different picture on them. The government would give holders a certain time to redeem the old money. This idea has merit for two reasons. First, it is reasonable to suppose that not all the new money would go back into the wool stocking again but might be exposed to spending. Second, the treasury would have a pretty good idea just where the re-issued money was, anyhow.
