At Oakridge

OAKRIDGE, July 20.—(Special)—The common council for the city of Oakridge met for a business session last week, the regular meeting having been postponed from Monday evening. The matter of extending water mains on the Southern Pacific property was referred to the water committee for immediate action. It was decided to eliminate the $10.00 connection fee for water service hook-up, and to reduce the advanced deposit for water service from $4.00 to $2.00 and to charge a penalty of 3 per cent on all water bills not paid before the 12th of the month. An ordinance to license pin and ball machines was read for the first time. It was reported that the work was progressing nicely on the small building to be used temporarily for a meeting place for the council.

Mrs. Minnie Wright was hostess to the P. N. G. club at her home Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. Louise Clark was honored with a miscellaneous shower in observance of her birthday anniversary. The afternoon was spent sewing and visiting. Refreshments were served by the hostess to Mrs. Clark, Mrs. Alta Spatz, Mrs. Ida Wert, Mrs. Mollie Henson, Mrs. Winifred Paddock, Mrs. Viola Flock, Mrs. Mary Gray, Mrs. Sara Jones, Mrs. Wright.

Services Held. Evangelistic song services were conducted at the Bible Standard church each evening the past week. Rev. Hart R. Armstrong, dean of the Bible Standard Training school of Eugene was in charge of the services and the singing was under the direction of Evangelist Roy Thompson and party. On Tuesday evening a special musical service was presented before a large crowd. The party was made up of Rev. and Mrs. Armstrong and son, Hart A. Junior, Evangelist and Mrs. Thompson, and Miss Lois Humphrey who graduated from the school in June. While here they were guests of Miss Alma Strand.

A special meeting was called for June McCullough is crabbing with Lyle Hartzel.

Lodge Meets. At Sunset Rebekah lodge Thursday evening plans were made for entertaining the grand president who expects to be here the first Thursday in August.

the members of the city council. Thursday evening to meet with Mr. Reid, PWA investigator and James K. King, former attorney for the city. Mr. Reid was here to ascertain why the city of Oakridge had not purchased the J. D. Ash water system. The competing system must be purchased in accordance with the arrangements made by the city in applying for a PWA loan to put in the new system. The council decided to purchase the Ash system at once at a price of $250,000. All members of the council were present, but Henry Cook.

The S. S. officers of the Methodist Episcopal church met in the church Wednesday evening for a short business session. Mr. Putnam was asked to teach the high school class for the rest of the summer. Mrs. George Meacham will instruct the intermediate class and Mrs. Joseph Pope and daughter, Joan will work in the primary department.

Members of the school board including Mrs. Louise Clark, chairman, Mrs. Sara Jones and E. T. Templeman, accompanied by Mrs. Templeman, made a trip to Eugene and vicinity Thursday to view the kitchen and manual training rooms of various types in the interest of the new ones to be installed at the high school. They visited at the Eugene high school at Monroe. A kitchen and work shop will be installed at the high school before the opening of school next fall and courses in home economics and manual training will be offered for the first time in the history of the Oakridge high school.

So Much for Love

CHAPTER I

At 5 o'clock in the morning and a Derrick, attired in a white swim suit, was poised for a dive. In an instant, using her lithe body as a spring, she would split the water beneath her. But just now she stood on the beach, looking at the clock. How nice it was to be 20 and healthy.

... in love.

... described a graceful arc and a ripple to mark the water where that arc had terminated, far out from the lake shore, the white rubber cap, appeared on the surface. Helena's arms, looking like a perky stroke that brought her float again. Easily she hoisted from the water and began shaking out her suit, squeezing little bits of lake water down her legs.

...ing ashore from the float, Helene tried to retrieve a bright coolie from the sand. Swinging it over her shoulder, she started off toward the big lodge which stood back from the lake in the shadows of the towering trees. "Hi!" she heard a voice remark. "I was the early bird—but you're just a lazy piker!"

... looked up to see Peter Henderson watching her from the veranda lodge. He stood, tall and handsome with a robe of towel wrapped around his athletic frame. Even a weak sun of dawn, Peter's blond hair shone attractively. Helene slowed her pace. "You're a queer fellow around here," she said. "I've heard that he can't swim." "He told himself, 'I've been hardly 24 hours ...'"

... and, perhaps, but it was true. He had overheard in love with Henderson. She had been at the meeting, and during the evening, in which they had been together, this attraction had been something more. Of course a foolish Helene had assured that it was. She had met Henderson on a Friday morning this was Saturday morning and she was in love with him!

... Helene Derrick knew things did happen. So why not? "But I'd better be careful," Helene warned herself during the night. "This is the first time I've been away from the store—really from it—and it may be that I'm ..."

... had, indeed, been a sleepless night of sleep. Helene had been thinking of the chain of events that had brought her to Crest Mountain. For two years she had been in Helene's big department and it was only this spring that she was given a department of her own. True, it was a small department, but it was an important one—especially during the summer.

... she knew that she had been paying strict attention to the uti-

Helene knew in her heart that she had lost herself to Peter Henderson, quite as suddenly as he had lost himself to her.

world. What do you say?" "I'd like to try it, Miss Landes."

So on the Monday of the following week Helene had found herself in the sportswear department. This department of Helene's big organization was hardly more than one corner of the "ladies' ready-to-wear"—but it was a glamorous corner, done in a silvered modernistic mode with indirect lighting and streamlined display cases. Old man Helvig had quickly recognized the trend toward outdoor activities on the part of young women, had been among the first to see that a smart costume was half the fun. He was proud of his sportswear department, and cautioned his buyers that it was to have not only the reasonably priced lines, but the exclusive outdoor costumes as well.

Helene liked the work from the very first day. She had always enjoyed swimming and tennis, but when her father died and she faced the world with a high school diploma and the problem of supporting her mother she found little time to engage in either sport. But now, at least, she could engage vicariously in them, and she took over Miss Little's place with a genuine enthusiasm that pleased customers and meant dollars and cents to Helvig's.

Quickly she learned the likes and dislikes of the staidest of her clientele—mostly young women who had little to do but sandwich sports between rounds of bridge and dancing. Some of them she grew to like, and among these was Sandra Leigh. Often Helene had seen the Leigh girl's picture in the rotogravure section of the newspapers, and she realized vaguely that she was the daughter of a man who had much to do with the upbuilding of the town. But until she had sold Sandra Leigh bathing suits and tennis shorts she hadn't known that she was a sensible and altogether likable person whose friends called her "Sandy."

Helene would not forget the day that Sandra Leigh had burst into the shop in a rush, asking to see bathing caps and sandals.

"We're getting away on the four o'clock to Crest Mountain Lodge," Sandra explained, "and I've left all my swimming things at the beach."

"Oh," Helene had exclaimed pleasantly. "I hear Crest Mountain Lodge is very pleasant."

"Haven't you ever been there?" Sandra Leigh seemed surprised.

Helene shook her head. "No."

The Leigh girl studied her a moment, then added, suddenly, "Why don't you come along? There's an extra man who's said to be awfully nice—and I'm the one who's been delegated to find the girl. Why don't you help me out? I really think you'd have a good time."

Helene hesitated. "It's good of you, Miss Leigh. But tomorrow's our busiest day in the week, and—"

"Maybe I could fix it," Sandra Leigh said quickly. "If I can, will you accept?" "Why ... why, yes."

Sandra Leigh had arranged it, too. Within an hour after the Leigh girl had left, Helene received a message from Miss Landes. It gave Helene permission to take Friday afternoon and Saturday off—and congratulated her upon getting along so well with a customer of the caliber of Miss Leigh.

Sandra telephoned just before noon. "Everything's fixed, darling. Will you meet me at the station at quarter to four? I'll introduce you to everybody—and by the time the train arrives at Crest Mountain Lodge you'll feel as if you'd known the whole gang all your life!"

Helene had doubted that, but it turned out to be perfectly true. The very fact that she was a friend of Sandra's gave her instant acceptance. But she didn't try to convey the impression that she was more than she was. By the time the train reached the lodge everyone on the party knew that she was "in the sportswear department" at Helvig's, and none seemed to think the less of her because of it. In fact, most of them were open in their admiration.

"Helvig's is where I should be right now," one of the girls confessed. "Father's supposed to be a big shot in these parts—but we all realize that if he paid his obligations we wouldn't know where our next meal is coming from. I'm the little lady who gets her picture in the newspapers' society columns and appears everywhere—as if nothing was wrong. Father calls me his 'front.' But I'd feel better if I were dragging down a few dollars a week in Helvig's, as you are."

They all took it for granted that Helene was in Helvig's because she wanted to be there, and not because of the force of circumstance; and, true to Sandra's prediction, Helene grew to feel she'd known the Leigh girl's friends all her life.

"This extra man I spoke about will meet us at the lodge," Sandra told Helene. "He lives in a little town on the other side of the state. I think you'll like him. His name is Peter Henderson and he looks more like one of those collar advertisements than any man I ever saw in my life."

Helene laughed. "I suppose there must be men like that—but I have to confess I've never seen one!"

Well, she had seen one now. Peter Henderson was unbelievably good-looking, and behind his blue eyes was both power and intelligence. Helene had been rather embarrassed at their first meeting, realizing that she was "the extra girl" for this young friend of Sandra Leigh's. But within a few moments Henderson had dispelled this uncomfortable feeling.

"You always had excellent taste," he laughed toward Sandra Leigh. "But I never realized it extended to 'blind dates.' Where've you been keeping this delightful Miss Derrick?" Sandra winked at Helene. "That's a secret, Peter."

But after dinner at the lodge that night, Helene told Peter Henderson the secret. While the others were gathered around a roaring log-fire, Peter and Helene had drifted out along the path which led toward the lake.

"I'm enjoying this so much," Helene said. "You see, I work in Helvig's—and when Sandra Leigh suggested I come along on the party I was quite overwhelmed."

"Then you haven't known Sandra long?" Helene shook her head. "Not more than a month. And then only as a customer at the store."

He looked at her sharply. "Good! A kindred spirit. ... I don't know Sandra's gang very well, either. You see," she smiled, "I live in a little town east of the mountains. Oh, we're street cars and a municipal debt—but we don't attempt to hold a candle to the metropolis you call your own."

That had been the beginning of Helene's understanding, this feeling that, in a measure, they were two people a bit out of their element. Following the path down toward the lake, they had decided to take the canoe out on moonlit waters. It was there on the lake that Peter Henderson had said, "I think I'm in love with you, Helene."

And Helene had quickly inquired, "Is this a game? A game you're played before?"

"No, Helene. ... That is, I mean if it's a game, I've never played it before."

"But you know nothing about me, Peter Henderson. And I know nothing about you."

He looked at her a long time before he answered. "All I know is that I'm in love with you. And that's enough for me."

At that impulsive confession, Helene had taken the defensive. But she knew in her heart that she had lost herself to Peter Henderson, quite as suddenly as he had lost himself to her.

Then in the early-morning hours she had started wide-eyed at
