Everyone Has Shifty Eyes, Camera Shows

By JOHN LEAR
 (Associated Press Staff Writer)
CHICAGO—(AP)—A camera taking movies of human eyes in action unveiled a surprise discovery today—everyone has a shifty look.

The eyes of every individual apparently take turns looking at things, Dr. Brant Clark of Los Angeles, ocular research student at the University of Southern California and inventor of the camera explained.

The shifts are made so swiftly that other eyes cannot detect it, he said. This was a direct contradiction of the generally accepted theory of why we can look at a thing with two eyes and see only one image.

The theory was that we are "right-eyed" or "left-eyed" just as we are "right handed or left handed."

The dominant eye, the theory held, fixed itself on an image first, and the other eye followed a split second later.

Contending there was "no neurological evidence" to support this theory, Dr. Clark tested it out with his "eye movement" camera.

Two magnifying lenses were placed in front of the eyes being photographed. Fourteen feet away was a six-inch screen in front of which a sensitized film moved continuously. Light reflected from mirrors was thrown into the eyes, and thence through the magnifying glasses to the film.

The resulting photograph was not a snapshot of the eyes, but a graph consisting of two beams of light. Every time the eyes moved, the path of the beam changed.

The graphs, Dr. Clark said, showed clearly that neither of the eyes of a number of individuals photographed was dominant.

Instead, he said, each eye took its turn at looking at things, in no apparent order.
