EUROPE'S "NEW DIPLOMACY"

THE Spanish government has prepared a "White Book" which presents its case to the family of nations much in the same manner of a little boy "telling" on the neighborhood toughs who beat him up.

This "White Book" is supposed to be a complete and untainted resume of the conditions under which the government was forced into civil war and how it was unfairly clouted by outsiders awaiting their chance to scavenge the marbles that might roll from the Spanish pockets.

All this is well and good. There should be a frank record of a situation which has been so covered with the slime of intrigue and covert plotting and so fraught with the danger of a general war. But the record doesn't end there.

Cables report that the "White Book," as prepared for the League of Nations Council, deals mainly with "Italian aggression" against Spain, with little mention of Germany's part on the Rebel side. The only logical deduction is that the Loyalists, with the silent approval of France and Great Britain, were moving to minimize German intervention, allow Hitler to withdraw from Spain without loss of prestige and thus bring about a split in the lately cultivated Berlin-Rome friendship.

Summed up, this means that diplomacy, the strict ethical requirements of vaunted foreign service schools, and myriad peace and anti-Fascist leagues have brought us no nearer, in actual practice, to international honesty than we were before, during and after the World War.

It does not take a genius at modern history to recall how the allies colored half the facts and concealed the other half in order to drag the United States into the World War. It is on record that Japan sided with the allies because the Japanese were offered an easy grab of German possessions in the Orient. And in the case of Rumania, which sold out to the allies merely because they could promise more war spoils, we have a classic example of intrigue on the grand scale.

After the World War came a flood of "White Books," "Red Books," and "Yellow Books" issued by the individual governments in a feeble effort to whitewash their own guilt. They provided valuable details for the technical historian, but they did not reveal the scheming and plotting or the underhand methods of war making that might steer future generations away from the same kind of trouble.

Experience still is our best teacher, and Americans who feel the stirrings of interest in some "glorious cause" overseas should refer without delay to the current manipulation of Spain's "White Book" and all that it implies.

JOB NEED CONTINUES

IMPERFECT as our statistics on unemployment are, they are at least complete enough to show why there is such a wide discrepancy between the increase in employment since the pit of the depression and the continuing large number of unemployed.

Figures compiled by the Alexander Hamilton Institute show that in March the number of employed persons in the United States rose to 41,698,000—highest for the recovery movement, with the exception of last December, and a gain of 8,433,000 since the depression low in March, 1933.

At the same time, there are still—according to this same authority—8,821,000 unemployed persons in the United States, a reduction of only some 7,000,000 from March of 1933.

For as men go back to work the population continues to increase. The supply of workers is larger now than it was when the depression began. To end unemployment, we must actually reach a higher level of employment than we have ever known before even in our best years.

TOWARD DEMOCRACY

WHEN the spring elections in Belgium dealt a crushing blow to the ambitions of that country's Fascist party, it began to look as if the swing toward dictatorship might be subsiding in Europe. Further evidence to the same effect is now provided by the elections in Holland.

In Holland the voters gave a strong endorsement to the "middle of the road" policies of Premier Hendrikus Colijn. The Dutch Nazi party, which had expected to win at least 10 seats in Parliament, apparently gets no more than four. The Dutch Communists suffered a similar setback and evidently must forfeit several of the seats they now hold.

For a time it looked as if the swing toward dictatorship would be irresistible. The democracies have got their second wind, however, and the old standards of freedom and liberty are advancing once more.

The most frequent color in animal eyes is brown, which ought to do away with that fable about the green-eyed monster.

WHAT OTHER EDITORS THINK

IS PWA DOOMED

(Salem Capital Journal)

IS the Public Works Administration, which since its inception during the height of the depression is estimated to have supplied five billion man-hours of labor to the unemployed, on its way out as a federal relief agency?

Surface indications and statements by well informed persons in the national capital present a strong case in the affirmative, although President Roosevelt and administration leaders in congress have made no such definite announcement. Senator Homer T. Bone of Washington, however, this week voiced what is said to be a prevailing sentiment among his colleagues when he said that "it appears clear that PWA is doomed to a slow death."

The conditions attached to current offers of grants for public building projects, such as that recently extended to the state of Oregon for a new library, are so drastic when compared with previous grants as to confirm the suspicion that the administration proposes to throttle PWA by the simple expedient of discouraging requests for its assistance. Abandonment of the policy of permitting the use of a portion of grant monies for the purchase of land and materials, and its restriction to the payment of labor taken from the relief rolls—when there is little if any skilled relief labor available—is also indicative of the fate awaiting PWA.

Even with a realization that the federal government can not go on forever with a work relief program of the proportions it has supported during the past three years, it is difficult to figure why PWA, which has created untold new national wealth in the way of needed and permanent improvements, should be side-tracked for the transitory benefits of PWA. Operating under the contract system PWA has been surprisingly efficient in securing full value for the money expended, ninety percent of which has gone to labor either directly or indirectly, serving to stimulate private industry in the production of materials.

Experience has proven, on the other hand, that PWA's antiquated hand labor methods are not more than a third efficient and the type of work done mostly temporary. If only one is to be discontinued, why sacrifice the most worthy?

WASHINGTON LETTER

(Eugene Register-Guard Washington Correspondent)

By RODNEY DUTCHER

WASHINGTON, June 5.—There seems to be no immediate prospect that the administration will officially promote consumer co-operatives, as some business men have feared.

But hundreds of minor New Dealers, have taken the matter into their own hands and established a series of small but growing co-operatives enterprises in the capital. This group includes a considerable number of employees of the several federal agencies, which in one way or another have had contact with phases of the co-operative movement in the last four years.

Last year, when Roosevelt appointed a committee of six to study the co-operative movement in Europe there was some disturbance among American merchants and tradesmen who feared the committee study might be a prelude to an active government program aimed at extending the movement in the United States.

The committee has returned and made its report without any drastic recommendations. Some members urged the extending to consumer co-operatives the same kind of credit aid the government gives to farmer's purchasing and marketing co-operatives. Establishment of an information service for co-operatives, similar on a small scale to what the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is to industry, was recommended.

No action has been taken on the reports, but they serve as a reliable source of information and to some extent have helped stimulate co-operative enterprises among Washingtonians in their positions as consumers and private citizens.

Turning Them Away

The latest "top-up" is the Rochdale Restaurant Inc., behind whose establishment Chairman Jacob S. Baker of the President's committee has been a moving spirit. More than a hundred persons subscribed to shares of stock and opened it at a central spot within a block of the State Department, Interior Department, WPA, PWA, SEC, the Social Security Board and other government agencies. It has been turning people away and plans to expand.

Operating on Rochdale co-operative principles, it sells share of stock at $5, limits purchases to 40 shares per member, allows but one vote per member, can pay a maximum 4 per cent dividend on shares, returns most of the profits to patrons and pays union wages.

The Washington Consumers Club has 450 dues-paying members. Its aims and activities include promotion of co-operatives and legislation for consumer protection, co-operative library and local news service, public meetings, arrangements for club discounts on member purchases of milk, fuel, jewelry, books and men's clothing and affiliation with a co-operative mail order house in New York.

There is a co-op grocery store which serves buying units in different sections of Washington and suburbs, with shares held by about 175 members. Selected gasoline and oil are sold by another incorporated co-operative, which has about 300 members and recently paid a patronage refund of 8 per cent after six months of operation. The Co-op Fashion Shop has blossomed out in that same block with the RGC building and advertises "well tailored coats, suits, toppers, dresses, millinery."

Credit Unions Organized

At least three groups within the government are promoting co-operative housing projects. About 88 co-operative credit unions have been organized, mostly under the federal credit union law. There's co-operative insurance for sale and a large number of co-operative ventures appear to be in the planning or discussion stage.

Government agencies with co-operative phases include: Farm Credit Administration, which has banking facilities for farmer purchasing and marketing co-ops and fosters and helps organize credit unions; Bureau of Labor Statistics, which collects co-op statistics; is now making a national survey of consumer co-op activities and houses the Consumer Project, which has worked out model state and federal co-operative laws; Rural Electrification Administration, which helps organize co-operatives among farmers for purchase of electric power; Resettlement Administration, which has organized consumer co-ops in Resettlement communities. WPA, which still has a small self-help co-operative section and once started several producer-consumer co-ops of that type. AAA Consumers Council's office, which has issued a directory of co-operative information and services by the government and other co-op information. TVA, which is experimenting with the idea in the Tennessee Valley. (Copyright, 1937, NEA Service, Inc.)

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

By DR. MORRIS FISHBREIN

(Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygeia, the Health Magazine)

ARTHRITIS is an inflammation of the joints. It is also called rheumatism. It must, however, be distinguished from that type of rheumatism known as rheumatic fever which is primarily a disease of the heart.

The joints may be infected by almost any kind of a germ, including those that cause gonorrhea, pneumonia and meningitis, as well as all of the ordinary forms of the streptococci and some of the staphylococci.

Finally, there seem to be cases of inflammations of the joints in which it is difficult to determine the presence of any germ.

Sometimes when a child suffers with scarlet fever or some of the other ordinary infectious diseases, there will be inflammations of the joints that last just a week or so with some pain. Sometimes in typhoid fever there may be inflammation of the joints.

In people who are sensitive to various foods or protein substances, the reaction may be associated with an inflammation of the joints.

These types of acute inflammation are not, however, the same as chronic inflammation of the joints commonly called chronic arthritis or rheumatism.

When arthritis is due to an infection of the joints by the germ that causes gonorrhea after it has already caused the venereal disease, the condition must be taken care of and treated according to the particular type of germ as well as with all of the usual treatment for joint inflammation. This applies to pneumonia and to meningitis.

In the kind of inflammation of the joints that is known as rheumatoid arthritis, there is a series of symptoms which are definite and which are not related to other types of inflammation.

Very frequently this type of rheumatism begins with swelling of the middle fingers of each hand. The swelling does not persist, but come and go. There may also be inflammations of the wrist and of the toes.

Sometimes the condition continues to get worse, but in other cases it stops and does not make much progress. If it does progress, the inflammations move upward so that later the wrist, the elbow and shoulder, and eventually the spine, may be infected.

In this type of arthritis it is not infrequent to find somewhere in the body a focus of infection, usually in the tonsils and in the teeth, but sometimes also in the prostate in man, in the appendix, gallbladder or sinuses.

It is, therefore, highly desirable in every case of this kind to have a diagnosis made as soon as possible and then to treat the condition actively to prevent its advancement.

Union Prevails in School Construction

The new Junction City high school building will be constructed under "closed shop" regulations, John B. Weldon, business agent of the building trades council announced following a conference with the Barnham Brothers Construction company. Approximately 30 men are employed in the project. At the same time, Weldon declared that the drive of the building trades unions since May had brought in 41 new members and promises of closed shop from 11 business firms.

DINNER PLATES STOLEN

Twelve gold-rimmed dinner plates and an electric alarm clock were stolen from the home of John P. Schimberg at 962 Ferry lane Thursday night, according to a report made to the city police Friday. Entrance to the house was made by breaking a pane of a glass door and turning the lock.
