Port Orford Meteor Believed Re-Found

holds in its cells the glassy olivine crystals of greenish yellow.

I have had considerable correspondence with R. M. Harrison of Myrtle Point the past few months. Due to a fractured vertebra Mr. Harrison has not been able until recently to go to his so-called "nickel mine." His letters and descriptions of "the rock" consistently give the impression that he is thoroughly reliable and knows something about the topic he is discussing," Mr. Pruett concluded.

MYRTLE POINT, July 20.—(AP)—Noted geologists who have sought the long-missing Port Orford meteor for years probably felt a little upset today when Robert Harrison, pioneer miner, announced he had known its location since 1882.

Harrison first saw the great rock he believes to be the meteor when, as a boy of 14, he accompanied his father into the Salmon mountain range. They met Dr. C. D. Elgin who located a nickel claim in a gulch drained by Poverty creek.

After Dr. Elgin's death, Harrison found the claim again in 1900 largely because he recalled the presence of a hard, heavy stone, rich in nickel ore. He sent a specimen to Dr. J. F. Dillar, federal geologist, who urged him to send the whole rock, undoubtedly a meteor, to the Smithsonian museum.

The miner, who estimated the rock was buried deeply in the ground and weighed 15 or 20 tons, said he was offered no financial assistance and promptly forgot the proposal. His interest in the rock was revived by publicity about the meteor last winter.

Harrison said the rock was about one and a quarter miles from the U. S. Chromium, Inc., camp. It is about 30 or 40 miles southeast of Port Orford and about 12 miles from Powers and five miles from the forest service road at China Flats.

The rock apparently sliced through Bald Knob and descended into the gulch where the years have covered it with undergrowth.
