Two Complete Jungle Villages Made For "Flight Into Nowhere"

Two complete jungle villages were built by more than 150 carpenters and landscape gardeners, working under the general supervision of Jack Holt, for use in the Columbia star's latest action drama, "Flight Into Nowhere." The film, which opens at the Mayflower theatre for a two-day run beginning Friday, is set in the South American jungles, in which Mr. Holt had, during vacations from Hollywood, conducted several big game expeditions. An authority on South American lore, Mr. Holt regrettably turned over his post as technical supervisor to qualified aviation experts when sets duplicating the tower and control room of the Burbank, Calif., airport were needed for the same picture.
