NEWSPAPERS AND THE PUBLIC

It is a healthy thing for the newspapers that the public is taking a keen interest in the problems which revolve around "free press." It matters very little that there are "jitters" on both sides of the issues.

There is very little to choose between people like Ickes and Seldes and a whole cult of politicians and self-appointed reformers who seek to destroy confidence in the press as an institution, with little consideration for facts, and those self-appointed defenders of the faith, such as Publishers Gannett and McCormick who see in every criticism a "menace to free press."

Most newspaper people admit that the American press is far from perfect, though they will challenge any suggestion that a government controlled press could serve so well the needs of a democracy. We believe this would be a fair summary of the situation:

Every government controlled press becomes merely an agency of propaganda for the ruling party.

A self-supporting press which lives on advertising and circulation revenues, as ours must, remains responsive to the public.

If a paper is dishonest in news reports or flagrantly unfair in editorial policy it loses reader good will and as its circulation falls away, it cannot sell advertising and so it starves to death.

What newspapers sell to the readers is NEWS; what they sell to the advertisers is not space or type but reader good will and interest.

Ah, yes, but say the critics, under this commercialized setup the newspaper's news and editorial policy falls under the domination of the advertisers and the bankers; publishers think more of their profits than of their duties as public servants, and this condition may be as evil as government dictation.

We believe most of the Oregon editors now assembled in Eugene would agree to this candid response:

There are some rogues in the newspaper business, as in every other business.

There are some cowards who pussyfoot not only in the presence of advertisers and bankers but under the pressures of every kind of pressure group.

The overwhelming majority hews to the line of impartiality in news and courage in editorial comment.

It will be helpful as newspaper people take the public into confidence and give them a glimpse of some of the tremendous changes which have affected newspaper work.

The Register-Guard news editor, for instance is charged with reading and selecting from about 80,000 words of telegraph and local copy which flows across his desk between 7 a. m. and 3 p. m. every day. You could indict him every day for what he has put in or left out.

Should the gas chamber execution at Salem have been allowed to crowd Hitler's dismissal of Finance Director Schacht to a back page in Friday's issue?

How are we going to find shorter, swifter, accurate ways of reporting "everything important everywhere" and still do complete "justice"?

What is a "banner story" in Oregon will be an item as it travels eastward to New York; a story to which the New York Times may have given three columns may become three paragraphs in the R-G.

Pictures are in demand! How far shall they be allowed to crowd written news? Color presses may soon revolutionize the entire mechanical process. How soon or how fast? Some experts predict that in a few years you will be reading daily papers printed on glistening magazine stock, with columns twice the present width and body type twice the present size.

John Jones pesters for years to get his name in the paper; then he gets in a jam and rouses battalions of friends to "keep it out" but the only answer is that nothing can be held out which gets into public courts. Sam Smith runs for office, woos the editor, till the editor endorses Bill Jenks; then Sam blames "Wall street influence." A riot or a wreck occurs, and out of dozens of conflicting statements, a reporter tries to sort facts.

One of the graybeards of the Oregon conference was swapping tales the other day and he was asked about his handling of a certain episode in his town: "Well," said he, "we made everybody hopping mad, and after 30 years, I've come to the conclusion that when that happens my reporters must have hit pretty near the real truth."

While it is difficult to find any good in a thief, it must be admitted that the subway guards who stole $1,300,000 in nickels were persistent and patient.

Hawaiian police investigated a nude tattooed on a man's arm as an indecent exposure case. Better roll down your sleeves, sailors!

WHAT OTHER EDITORS THINK

BASIC POLICY FOR STATE ROAD REVENUES

The League of Oregon Cities which has done a good prelegislative job of educating the state on the need of cities for new funds for street resurfacing, should not get cold feet and fall to introduce in this session the revenue reallocation measure so widely discussed. Mayor Hand of Corvallis, newly named president of the League, says the allocation of $1.50 per capita a year to cities is going to be sought, notwithstanding the adverse recommendation by the outgoing governor and the lack of enthusiasm for the measure by the new chief executive.

The League's bill has small chance of passage but a legislative debate on the measure would crystallize public sentiment on the most question and would fix state policy on the problem of the needs of the municipalities versus those of the state highway system.

As a legislative policy, these points must be insisted upon:

1.—No reallocation of highway funds should be made which would interfere with the steady payment of state highway bond principal and interest.

2.—State highway funds should not be touched for city purposes if any reallocation results in loss of federal match moneys. Oregon cannot afford to forfeit one cent of the 62-38 per cent match proposition made by the federal government.

3.—No reallocation should be approved if it is interpreted as "diversion" of highway funds; when and if the state is prepared to assist the cities with their streets, any moneys thus allocated must be hedged about with restrictions which will make the money usable for street work only.

4.—The state highway system must be excellently maintained; to allocate money to the cities at the expense of necessary upkeep of the state system would not be a gain.

Only when these four basic needs of the state system have been met has the League a case. If a residue exists in potential highway revenues for 1939-1940 after these requirements are served, the issue raised by the League resolves itself into this question of policy: Does the state wish to slow down its main highway construction program in order to permit cities to improve their existing pavements without resorting to direct tax levies? No one can gainsay that real property levies in most cities are too high and that cities have a sizeable problem on their hands in keeping up streets out of the few sources of taxation which they possess.

WASHINGTON LETTER

By JOHN T. FLYNN
NEA Service Staff Correspondent
The controversy which is arising about the proposed new-style slick method of keeping the nation's books may turn out to be one of those things which will help to clear up some foggy ideas about national finance which have been persisting for six years.

For one thing it will help to clarify the position of those who from the beginning have advocated spending and at the same time a balanced budget.

I recall that at the beginning of the last Congress, when in this column I urged a balanced budget but at the same time warned that any serious reduction in government spending would produce a depression, many people very critically asked me to make up my mind where I stood. "You want the budget balanced but you want the government to spend and you don't even object to borrowing—what are you talking about?"

It is an amazing thing how long it takes to get a simple problem of public finance understood.

How to Balance the Budget
The key to all this lies in the difference between government investment and government spending. And the key to the present confusion about the federal budget lies in the failure to correctly distinguish between these two things.

The government can balance its budget now by adopting the rule of paying for relief and recovery efforts which produce no off-setting revenues out of tax revenues. Then it may engage in whatever adventures it chooses in the field of investment and raise the money for that purpose by means of bonds.

If the government spends a billion dollars for housing, raises the billion by issuing bonds, and then rents the houses for a sum sufficient to pay the interest and amortize the principal, there is no need to include those expenditures in the budget. If the government finds it necessary to subsidize such a housing development, the subsidy should be counted as an expenditure.

"Investment" covers many sins
It is this perfectly sound principle which is now being misused. The plan now is to use the word "investment" to cover the multitude of expenditures which are not investment. Money spent on soil conservation, on WPA, on grants to states, on bridge and highway building which are outright expenditures and will never come back to the federal government, are not investments no matter how desirable the expenditures may be.

But the discussion serves to outline, not merely a wise bookkeeping policy. That policy may be stated thus:

That the government will engage in useful low-cost housing construction throughout the United States to be financed by government bond issues, the housing production to be operated on a basis government will at first subsidize housing developments in part but such subsidies to come out of tax moneys; and that all government expenditures not susceptible of recapture shall be paid for out of tax money.

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

By DR. MORRIS FISHEIN
Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygiene, the Health Magazine

Superfluous hair is most annoying. As a result the promoters of various mixtures for the removal of superfluous hair frequently reap a harvest from unsuspecting people who do not realize the possible dangers that may be associated with unsafe removal techniques.

Some chemical substances used to remove hair are so irritating that they damage the skin. The use of the razor is satisfactory, but, of course, does not remove the hair permanently.

Electrolysis is commonly advised by specialists for permanent removal of small amounts of superfluous hair. This method, however, may cause harm unless it is carried out under the best possible conditions by someone experienced in this field.

In the proper use of electrolysis, the patient usually lies down. The person doing the work must see the hairs in the same type of light at all times. The area to be treated is first washed with soap and water and then cleaned with either benzine or carbon tetrachloride to remove fatty substances from the skin.

The skin is dried with sterile gauze and washed off with 70 per cent alcohol. The needle must be sterilized.

The electric current naturally must pass through the root of the hair. The patient holds a wet sponge attached to the positive terminal of the apparatus in the palm of the hand, then the operator puts the needle into the follicle or root of the hair.

When the needle is in place a current of about a minute's duration is allowed to pass and act on the hair root. The hair is held by a forceps and, when the root is destroyed, will slide easily out of place.

It is customary to stop the removal after about 30 minutes (during which only 10 to 20 hairs may be removed) and suspend treatment for at least a week.

Union Meetings, Preachers' Parliament, To Be Held During Week

Evangelistic Services Will Be Held January 25-27 at Methodist Episcopal Church

By JEAN RANDOLPH
(Register-Guard Church Editor)

THE annual preachers' parliament of Christian churches of Oregon and a series of union evangelistic meetings will be the main events on the church calendar for the coming week. Dr. W. R.
