"A NEWSPAPER IS A CITIZEN OF ITS COMMUNITY"

NOT ALWAYS HAPPILY

Already, though there is not yet war, the threat of war with its depressing effect on raw nerves, is claiming its victims.

A young man of 17 in Los Angeles, dreaming that the war had come, awoke with a sick feeling. "I don't want to kill anybody," he said, and straightway went out and hanged himself.

This bitter tragedy of a youth too sensitive to face a brutalized world, has been duplicated abroad. In London three persons committed suicide within five days, each after listening to broadcasts on the European situation.

The coroner in one case made this comment, which competes strongly for the all-time championship in understatement:

"News is not always happily expressed over the wireless."

No, not always happily. Yet the news being itself in the main unhappy, what can be done except to face it bravely, resolutely and with all the courage we can muster day by day?

Boston's nocturnal nudist certainly wasn't taking any chances of catching laryngitis. He wore a handkerchief around his throat.

David Rockefeller, a University of Chicago student, found no money in his pocket when he was asked to pay for a tennis game. Imagine a Rockefeller without a dime!

John Barrymore and bride have split up again. Could it be that he was too enthusiastic in that spanking scene they played in "My Dear Children"?

Two crew members of a U. S. boat went to the brig when they shouted: "Down with Mussolini!" That's not so serious. What if they had yelled: "Down with the ship!"

Bing Crosby took precautions after kidnapping threats against his children. It might have been different if it had been one of his horses.

WHAT OTHER EDITORS THINK

WHY SCOLD THE TREES?

(Pendleton East Oregonian)

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE HARRY HOPKINS is quoted as saying that "the primary problem of recovery is to stimulate the flow of private capital into productive enterprise." It will be easier to do that after we have restored normal buying power to agriculture and to those dependent upon farming. It is easy to see why business is subnormal, with consequent unemployment, if you observe the market data.

Farm prices, for all groups, were eight per cent below the pre-war basis in February but living and production costs were 20 per cent above pre-war. The farm dollar was worth 23 cents less than in the pre-war period and it was worth 16 cents less than in the spring of 1937.

The trouble has been with wheat, corn and cotton. Truck crop, meat animal, and dairy produce prices have been above pre-war but surplus crop prices have been down.

For instance, the average farm price of wheat was $1.24 a bushel on February 15, 1937. On February 15, 1939, it was 56.9 cents a bushel. The average farm price of corn on February 15, 1937, was $1.03 a bushel, on the same date this year it was 43.9 cents a bushel.

Cotton sold at 12.58 cents a pound in early 1937 and on February 15, 1939, the average price was 8.23 cents a pound.

Those prices are sufficient to account for slack business just as low farm prices caused a business depression when Herbert Hoover was president. Conditions are not as bad as in 1932 because the banks are safe and the farm act of 1938 permits farmers to keep their feet upon solid ground.

But we cannot expect a normal volume of business or a normal amount of employment while rural buying power is 23 per cent under the pre-war status. Nor does it do much good to scold the tree because it is not providing a satisfactory amount of recovery fruit. The best plan is to see that the tree has soil with proper fertility and moisture.

Secretary Wallace has good ideas upon that subject and it is encouraging to hear that the senate is ready to move strongly in support of his program. It is not a farm program any more than it is a program for the general welfare.

WASHINGTON LETTER

BY BRUCE CATTON

(Register-Guard Washington Correspondent)

WASHINGTON, May 13.—If Congress goes ahead with present House leadership plans and reduces the undistributed profits tax to a skeleton, one of Mr. Roosevelt's most prized "reforms" will go out of the window.

The Treasury Department apparently is ready to consent to virtual elimination of this tax, in the interests of restoration of business confidence. The department's attitude is: if enough business men think the tax a deterrent to recovery; if actually does operate as a deterrent; regardless of Treasury experts' opinion as to its merits.

And, if the White House gives open or tacit assent to the change, it will be retreating on an issue which barely three years ago Mr. Roosevelt regarded as vital.

Brought On A Battle

The tax was originally passed in June, 1936. It called for a graduated levy of from 7 to 22 per cent on undistributed corporate profits with a corporation income tax ranging from 8 per cent on the first $2000 to 15 per cent on all in excess of $40,000.

It was promptly denounced. Herbert Hoover charged that it tended to "stifle honest enterprise, to lessen national assets, to help the powerful instead of the weak, to cost men jobs." The United States Chamber of Commerce assailed it as having "a retarding effect on business recovery."

Mr. Roosevelt warmly defended it, declaring that "we must choose between democracy and special privilege in taxation," and asserting that opposition to the tax was spread "by those who have used corporations in the past to build up their own economic power."

A year ago Congress modified the law, thus bringing on the President's famous speech at Appomattox, W. Va., when he turned an address to a high school graduating class into a defense of his tax policies and asserted: "The administration does not want large, closely-held corporations making large profits to be used as a vehicle by the small number of their owners in order to avoid legitimate income taxes."

The extreme sensitivity of congressmen to the wants of war veterans was demonstrated when Congressman Rankin's bill to grant or increase benefits to more than 100,000 World War veterans or their dependents passed the House by a vote of 359 to 1. It was shown even more clearly next day, when Minority Leader Martin discovered that some 20 absent Republicans had been mistakenly listed as paired against the bill.

For the next 10 minutes, members were rising to demand that the record be corrected and to insist that "had I been present I most certainly would have voted for this bill."

Capital Hatchet Fight

Two of the most determined hatchet men in Washington got on each other's trail when Tennessee's Senator McKellar and Interior's Secretary Ickes clashed over the personality and qualifications of Ross Eakin, superintendent of Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

McKellar charged that funds in Eakin's office had been misappropriated; Ickes investigated and announced that it wasn't so. McKellar tried to amend the Interior Department appropriation bill to provide that Eakin should get no salary, but the amendment was voted down.

Eakin has been in the National Park Service for years. He was formerly superintendent of Glacier National Park, and when Great Smoky was set up he was put in charge of it. Ickes likes to point out that he cannot inquire into Eakin's politics or the politics of Eakin's employees without violating civil service regulations.

McKellar, who complains that Eakin has hired many Republicans, is popularly supposed to have obtained jobs on the government payroll for more people than any other man in the Senate. On the floor, his desk is beside that of Majority Leader Barkley.

Six weeks ago, Ickes issued an order transferring Eakin to Shenandoah National Park, on the theory that McKellar's attacks had made Eakin's position in Great Smoky highly uncomfortable.

Congressmen are vitally interested in all matters affecting the personal rights, privileges or reputations of their own membership.

The largest and most attentive crowd I have seen on the House floor all spring was present when Congressman Gearhart of California took the floor to charge that his California colleague, Congressman Elliott, had tried to brand him a grafter.

Defining an Aitchbone Opener, Etc.

There are today about 16,000 different kinds of jobs in American industry—and for the first time they are all being tabulated, defined and cross-indexed in a bulky new Dictionary of Occupations.

This dictionary will be put out in the near future. It is the result of two years' work by the Job Analysis Section of the U. S. Employment Service, which expects that the book will be invaluable to the nation's state employment services.

There are some amazingly specialized jobs in American industry, and some of them have some outlandishly unfamiliar names. (Do you, for instance, know what an aitchbone opener's job consists of? Or can you define a bulldozer operator?)

Along with the dictionary, there is being compiled a set of job description lists, which go into details about the different industries, telling what the requirements are, what working conditions are like, and so on. Equipped with all of this data, the employment services will be able to provide speedier and more accurate service to job-hunters and employers alike.

Oh yes, an aitchbone opener is a slaughterhouse worker who cuts through the flesh and bone of a beef carcass pelvis, beginning the process of splitting the carcass into halves. And a bulldozer operator runs one of those construction-job tractors with a curved metal plate in front o' push dirt around.

AN EDITORIAL ON HEALTH

BY DR. MORRIS FISHBEN

Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygeia, the Health Magazine

Whether it be a 100-meter dash in the Olympic games or a potato race at the lodge picnic, at some time during your life you have been or will be called upon to perform as a runner.

And when that time comes you will realize—if you haven't already—the importance of breathing in athletic competition and exercise. The man or woman with the best trained breathing often wins by a margin attributable to that alone.

Athletes change their style of breathing according to the event. In the short dashes the runner breathes normally through the time the starter says "On your mark!" At "Get set!" the sprinter will take a breath and hold it until the gun fires the start. He retains the breath until he is underway. Better sprinters hold the breath much longer than those who are untrained.

Swimmers differ in their style of breathing. Most, however, shorten the time when the breath is taken in and given out and increase the rate of breathing with the rate of the stroke.

Do you know how to breathe in golf?

Experts take a deep breath before the drive and hold it during the swing of the club. This serves to stiffen the chest muscles and aids in control of the arms. After the drive, they let out the air and breathe normally. During putting the breathing should be quiet and shallow.

The manner in which you breathe as you exercise has much to do with your efficiency. Training four or five weeks will increase the amount of carbon dioxide that you give out and the amount of oxygen you absorb during breathing. You should reach the peak after about four to six weeks of training.

You breathe more rapidly, of course, during exercise. If you are an average person, your normal rate is about 17 or 18 breaths per minute. Women breathe a bit more rapidly than men and all of us breathe more rapidly when we are standing up than when we are sitting down.

At high altitudes your breath rate also is more rapid because of the lessened amount of oxygen. The breathing rate, to some extent, is determined by the size of the lungs.

Doctors refer to your "vital capacity." This represents the largest amount of air you can take in with a single breath. The average rate for a grown man is three quarts, for a grown woman two quarts. The capacity of growing boys and girls is slightly less.
