ful and courageous pilots. We arrived on the front Tuesday night. The Russians have been keeping the front under heavy artillery fire in daytime. Russian three and six-inch shells were falling at the rate of one or two per second, even at night. In single file over the creaking snow, we walked cautiously along a path in the woods. In the din of cannonading we saw fire ahead and stumbled around the thick trees to it. It was a 33-ton Russian tank, about 50 feet long and 16 feet high and wide. The interior was a blazing inferno. The air was sickening with the stench of burning flesh. Nine of the crew had been trapped inside.

These great land cruisers carry two three-inch guns and four or five machine guns. Thirteen tanks had been destroyed in this small sector in two days. Just behind one tank we saw the body of a Finnish soldier who inadvertently had set off a mine. His body was left there as an object lesson to others to walk more carefully.

In a little headquarters tent, hidden in the forest, the commanding major showed us by dim lantern light several holes made in the canvas by shell fragments.

Hot in Cold

"It's been pretty hot here these last days," he said. As he spoke a Finnish battery just outside the tent began whamming away at the Russians again.

Moving up into the lines we saw ghostly groups of tired men in white parkas, slogging along the roads headed back for rest after three days of fighting. They moved back in small, detached groups, silent for the most part except for the creaking of their boots in the snow.

The road was lined with low sledges drawn by tired little Finnish horses. They carried more men and supplies for both men and horses.

In Wednesday's thrusts at the line, the Russians concentrated the heaviest bombardments yet seen in this war, but in spite of the Russian losses, which every Finnish soldier says have been terrific,

TOO REAL FOR COMFORT—Bystanders sighed over the fate of this unfortunate man, so realistic was his portrayal of an air-raid "victim" during a recent drill at Sydney, Australia. The drill, staged by Australia's national emergency service to awaken residents to possible war dangers, included the bursting of a bomb and medical aid for victims.

they have been unable anywhere to dent the Mannerheim line, the Finns say. And new lines are going up behind the front line. I saw hundreds of men working at them tonight.

—was failing to make progress against the main Finnish defenses, which reportedly inflicted heavy losses on the Russians.

Reds Held

On the central front, the Finns claimed that they were continuing counter-attacks that not only broke up the Russians' mid-Finland offensive but took a big toll in casualties.

On the Arctic front in the far north, Finnish officials reported, the defense lines east of Ivalo held —with the aid of a heavy snow-storm—and a Finnish counter-attack made some progress at one point south of Petsamo.

The Russian air raids today followed a series of attacks in the last two days in which the Finns reported they had shot down at least a dozen planes.
