

Agony Moments In Plunge Told

LONDON—(UP)—Auxiliary Fireman Jack Read, 27, was standing on a bridge connecting the two top floors of Lambeth Hospital, London, 40 feet above the ground, when a bomb crashed beneath the bridge blowing it into the air and Read with it.

When he woke up in hospital, the first thing he did was to record his impressions in a diary. That was four months ago, and at the time he never thought he would recover, but today he is back at his post.

Here are some extracts from this amazing diary:

"I am hurled upwards through the air at terrifying speed. At the top of my flight I seem to be stationary for a second. I am conscious of a brilliant light from the exploding bomb, and in this instant I see the bridge breaking up underneath me.

"Kirby (the officer-in-charge) is flying through the air and the light is playing on his polished brass epaulettes.

Long Way to Fall
"There is the roar of the explosion and the rumble of falling masonry. Then it is dark. I begin to turn over and over as I fall. I know that I have a long way to drop and I imagine that I shall be killed when I reach the ground. I let my body go limp because I think that by doing this I will possibly avoid violent fractures.

"I wonder how much it is going to hurt. There is still a loud rumbling of falling debris, and I feel my forehead become moist against the wind as something grazes the skin.

"It seems to me I have already been falling a week. I begin to feel annoyed—annoyed at the thought of dying before this war is finished.

"All my life I have watched civilization in revolt: first creeping, then a stampede. It would have been so interesting, so exciting.

"Here I am turning crazily over and over and falling towards my doom. I am annoyed.

How Hard the Ground
"Then I wonder again how hard the ground is going to be.

"I am conscious of the fact that I have stopped falling. There is a pain in my left arm, but I can't think that I am alive. A piece of debris, a door frame or something, lands across my chest, but its full force is taken by the debris that is on the other side of me. I welcome the twinge in my chest. "I must still be alive. I attempt to raise the debris, but my left arm will not respond to the impulse. My right arm is active, and I manage to get up and walk toward a group of dim lights that are appearing in front of me."

The diary, written in hospital, ends: "I go off to sleep after saying my prayers for the first time in years."

Science Should Govern Appetites of U. S. A.

CHICAGO—(UP)—More than 4 per cent of the population never heard of a vitamin and 8½ per cent does not know a protein from a carburetor. Therefore, experts on nutrition agree that people should allow science—not their appetite—to govern diet.

A nationwide survey shows that 48 per cent of the people admit the scientific diet is better, but 40 per cent still hold out for the decision of their stomachs. Science as a food selector is advised by 56 per cent of the doctors, 64 per cent of the dentists, and 85 per cent of the home economics teachers.

Other facts brought to light by the survey are:
Only 30 per cent of the people actually do something to insure getting sufficient vitamins.
Only three-tenths of 1 per cent of all doctors say that fish is "brain food."

Rural people eat three times as much meat as those in the city. In voting for the most tasty foods, 35.7 of the people chose meat, 21.7 chose leafy vegetables. Forty-one per cent of the men named meat as their favorite food. Women are divided between meat and vegetables as a favorite.
