Industrial Arts' Importance Told By OSC Speaker

Industrial arts should be considered a part of general education and not a specific phase of vocational education, it was contended by Professor George B. Cox, head of the department of industrial arts of Oregon State college, at the industrial arts section of the conferences on curriculum, being held during the summer session on the University of Oregon campus. Definition of the industrial arts theme was given by the chairman of the session, James H. Lambert, assistant professor of industrial arts at the University of Illinois, who said:

"Industrial arts is that subject or field in which the child through practical manipulation processes as well as through intellectual activity develops attitudes, knowledge, and skills, which will make the world industry, its materials and processes, more meaningful."

John F. Schenk, superintendent of schools at Corvallis, urged the teachers and school administrators in attendance to give new scope to industrial arts, which through a strong program, he said, can be a valuable tool in developing vocational interests.

School administrators will be wise if they have superior teachers who can handle a few activities well, rather than have a large variety of vocational activities indifferently taught, declared Ted Sexton, teacher in the Bend schools.
