Poultry Men Study Grit

CORVALLIS, Aug. 21—(AP)—Because chickens have no teeth they swallow grit with their food and then operate an internal grinding machine. A lot of research has been done on the food but very little on the kind of grit that is best for chickens. Poultry specialists at Oregon State college recently completed one trial to determine what is the best kind of grit to feed broilers being raised in confinement for the meat trade. The study shows that such birds will not eat as much of the common seashell or calcium-bearing grit as they will rock or silica grit. W. T. Cooney, research assistant who conducted the experiments, concluded that chickens evidently have the ability to detect an unbalanced ration so far as minerals are concerned at least, and hence when the feed ration itself contains adequate calcium, the chickens do not eat much of the calcium grit. Even though broilers are fed largely on the finely ground mash foods, they seem to do better where grit is provided, Cooney reports. Those receiving no grit graded down to 80 per cent no. 1's as compared to 90 per cent or more no. 1's for the groups receiving grit.
