Farm Labor Supplied By State Service

With one of Oregon's biggest harvest seasons drawing to a close, the state employment service report on agricultural placements for the first 10 months of 1941 showed 132,736 farm jobs handled, compared with 102,735 for the entire year of 1940.

Reports from 23 employment offices to Director Lee C. Stoll put Salem's 36,895 placements in the lead, Portland next with 29,381, and Eugene ninth with 3,823. Although stringencies developed at a few points largely because of weather conditions, employment service records show that with the exception of calling a few hundred families from California's central valley for berry picking, most of the harvest emergencies were met with Oregon workers.
