Let's do some planning in the face of the meat situation—we have several alternatives. We can go all-out and serve the old-time roast, as often as our meat ration will permit, and omit meat from other dinner menus. If that is the verdict in your family, you'll want to plan a meatless main dish for the meatless dinners. Here is a suggestion which should soothe the ruffled feelings of members of the family who, having eaten their roast, are counting the days until the next one makes its appearance.

You can have 'em low—and you can have 'em high, this spring—and both kinds of bonnets will be right in style, as evidenced by the pair of millinery fashion inspirations pictured above. The one at left is a charming double-decker of Sally blue felt, the crown being a little hat in itself, set on a sweetheart brim. Black straw cording forms a many-looped bow and streamers for decoration at the back. Of course, if you want to go "high hat," you can have a topper like that at right, reminiscent of the Empire mode. Of navy blue felt, it's trimmed with an upside-down madonna blue velvet bow. The high, shell-shaped brim is attached to a little cap, making an effective adjunct to the chignon coiffure.
