

Glacier Priest' Sees Long War With Japan

LOS ANGELES — (AP) — Father Edward R. Hubbard, known as the "Glacier Priest" for his Alaskan explorations, predicts that the war with Japan will last from six to ten years.

"That may sound too pessimistic; I hope I am wrong," said the priest in an interview here after returning from the Aleutians, where, he declared, American troops are anxious to fight the Japanese.

He added that he doesn't believe the Japanese presently plan to seize Alaska, although they want to carve out an empire in the South Pacific, which is more desirable and more easily defended.

"But the Japs do want to hold Alaska in the Aleutians because that would be an ideal submarine base for domination of the North Pacific," the priest said.

"We should have got there first, but on my last trip north in January I saw what leads me to believe we will capture it eventually."

"The Aleutians are stepping stones from Asia to America, but not from America to Asia. That is something many strategists do not realize. The simple reason is that the weather goes the other way, in the Japs' favor."

Father Hubbard said he thinks Russia should disclose her war aims.

"England has told her war aims," he said. "China has been her most honest ally. But Russia remains the great enigma. Unfortunately, the Russians, by giving Japanese the Kamchatka fisheries a short time ago, also gave them the weather stations. This greatly facilitates the Japanese campaign."
