Geologist Back From Colombia Urges Good Will of Americans

By GLADYS TURLEY
News of a revolution in Colombia follows closely an interview with John W. Butler, Jr., former Marshfield boy, now a resident of Colombia's capital, Bogota, who stopped over in Eugene while en route to Marshfield for a visit with his parents, whom he has not seen since his last trip from Colombia four years ago. The elder Butler was Marshfield city recorder for many years.

Butler, a geologist for the Texas Oil company, has lived in Colombia since 1935, first going there as official petrographer for the Colombian government, which $64 title means that he used his knowledge of rocks, gained at the University of Oregon, in the service of the South American republic.

The former young Oregonian apparently did not expect a revolution in the country he left last April for a four-months furlough in the United States, because he told the interviewer that Colombia was one of the more stable South American republics politically, not having had a revolution since the early 1900's.

Centralized Government
In his talk Butler related how the Colombian government is highly centralized, the appointive power of the president even reaching down to the mayorality of towns. Butler, however, asserted that this was not necessarily a bad situation because under certain normal conditions in South American countries a highly centralized government is desirable.
