Alfalfa Forage Crop Suggested As Salvage for Growing Season

There's still a chance to plant a forage crop that will salvage something from an otherwise peculiar growing season.
Alfalfa—preferably Grimm alfalfa, will fill the breach in many areas of western Oregon, according to E. R. Jackman, Oregon State College. Time for planting alfalfa is fast running out, however, he added.

June Planting
Jackman recommended that alfalfa, seeded alone, be planted in western Oregon not later than June but with extra moisture this year a little later may still do. Recommended rate of seeding is 12 pounds per acre on a firm seedbed. Inoculation was also suggested.

In recent years, the acreage of alfalfa in western Oregon has been going down—almost to the vanishing point in some counties. A principal reason for the decline in alfalfa acreage is the fact that as old stands have been plowed under, the land has been replaced with other crops.

Current high prices have made farmers reluctant to lose a year's use of their land during the time it takes to get alfalfa established, little value is received from alfalfa Jackman explained. Although during its first year, Jackman points out that in following years, it will produce fully twice as much in pounds of digestible feed as any other crop. On non-irrigated land it approaches what is expected from irrigated ladino clover.

Queen of Forage

Jackman describes alfalfa as being the "queen of the forage family." It has everything that means "oomph" in a feed—high protein, vitamins, minerals—and possibly some feed values not yet discovered.

Alfalfa also costs less per ton because stands last for years; it frees the owner from the worries that accompany annual crops, and it makes green feed in the hot summer months when other fields are brown and dry, Jackman summarizes. Alfalfa when plowed under increases soil fertility.
