What the World Needs (From the Washington Evening Star) In their addresses at Bolivar, Mo., President Truman and President Gallegos of Venezuela offered the world another example of the wholesome spirit animating Pan-Americanism. The spirit is one of friendship on equal terms and of good neighborliness that expresses itself not in fine words but in concrete action aimed at promoting and increasing the unity, well-being and security of the entire hemisphere.

This is something that exists in no region of comparable size and variety anywhere else in the world. It has pulled together 21 American republics in a system of regional co-operation under which they are pledged to abide by a common code of good conduct, to work together economically, to settle disputes among themselves peacefully, to establish a united front against international subversion, to integrate their military strength as much as possible, and to take collective action whenever one or another of them is threatened by aggression coming either from within or outside the hemisphere.

The spirit behind all this is the spirit of free men—men like Simon Bolivar who used the sword, as President Gallegos observed in his excellent address, to liberate and not to dominate or enslave. Pan-Americanism is flourishing and continuing to wax strong because within recent decades no powerful dictator has risen in this part of the world with ambitions to build an empire on the shattered remains of once-independent lands. It is true enough, of course, that some of the Americas have authoritarian regimes, but they are not hungry for conquest, and the peoples living under them are peoples with liberty rooted deeply in their traditions. Above all, in President Truman's words, not a single one of these lands to the south of us is "afraid of invasion from its great neighbor to the north"—a fact that has played a role of first importance in developing hemispheric co-operation.

The same cannot be said for other great regions of the globe. The outstanding example is Europe. There a single totalitarian power has already absorbed, by direct and indirect aggression, nearly a dozen different lands, and it now threatens to take over the entire continent. Fear, suspicion and a sense of impending disaster abound. Tyranny is at large and on the move, not the spirit of Bolivar. Instead of mutual trust between Russia and the West, there is nothing but mounting tension and grim animosity. Co-operation, good neighborliness, collective security—these are all absent from the Kremlin's policy toward the Europeans.

Though far from perfect, the inter-American system stands out in shining contrast. It demonstrates what men and governments can do when they are really anxious to have co-operation and peace among themselves. Nor is there any reason—apart from perversity—why it should be confined to the New World. President Truman has raised a sound hope at Bolivar in asserting that slowly but surely, despite present discouragements, the spirit behind it can be made to animate international relations everywhere. Soviet policies notwithstanding, the United Nations, given the will for it, can find the way to it.

Educational Experimentation

(From the Washington Evening Star) It is pleasant, in a nostalgic sort of way, to know that there are still some parents who believe that the old-fashioned methods of teaching reading, writing and arithmetic were not so bad, after all. In the modern age of "progressive education" it has become extremely unpopular to yearn for the good old days when more emphasis was placed on spelling, American history, writing a good hand and learning the multiplication table. One usually keeps these thoughts to himself, nowadays, lest he arouse an array of arched eyebrows.

But a group of parents in Bethesda, Md., unable longer to contain themselves, have come right out with a denunciation of Montgomery County's newfangled educational program—let the eyebrows arch as they may. In resolutions presented to the school board they took the stand that the public schools should return to teaching children the "essentials of knowledge" in tried and proved ways. They resolved that "the present system of education which is based on experimental philosophy, and which has not produced the scholastic results we know our children are capable of achieving, be discontinued immediately." They also protested the treatment of children as educational "guinea pigs" and as "behavioristic, psychiatric, personality or social problems."

Mrs. Duncan H. Brooks, a leader in the rebellion, told reporters that from what she hears, "parents all over the country may feel pretty much as we do." That would not be unlikely, since many parents received their education in the pre-progressive era. Some of them even learned the hard way—to the tune of a hickory stick, or at least a ruler. They are not willing to concede that they received a brand of education inferior to that handed out under today's "play and project" system. Many of them have succeeded in life; a few even have become presidents. And most of them have found it necessary to give their offspring supplementary instruction at home, especially in the fundamental three Rs.

So these elders may be pardoned if they sometimes look askance at education's progressivism. Some of the old ways undoubtedly have no place in today's schools. But some of the "experimental philosophy" being tried out in many sections may be found to be wanting, too, when the young subjects of the experiments fare forth to make their way in the world.
