

South Willamette Residents Set Meeting to Discuss Problems

Annexation of a portion of the South Willamette area to the city of Eugene during the election last May 21 has created a complicated legal situation in regard to the sanitary district in that community.

The South Willamette Sanitary District, created by court order, had a legal problem thrown into the mix when the voters in part of the area voted to be annexed to the city of Eugene.

Meeting Set

Because nobody has found the answer to the resultant legal complications, residents in both the annexed area and in that part of the district still outside the city limits have scheduled a meeting at Dunn School the evening of Aug. 12.

The meeting is called under auspices of the sanitary district board of directors, and will be attended by City Manager Deane Seeger.

The city manager said annexation of the northern portion of the district has raised a serious question as to whether that area still is legally a part of the district, and has confused the whole picture as to sewage installation.

"The city cannot start a sewage project in the annexed area if its residents are going to be assessed by the sanitary district."

As Seeger sees it, there are two alternatives: 1: to seek a legal determination through court action as to the status of the district; or 2: annex the remainder of the district to the city by special election.

"The prime interest of all the people in the South Willamette area is to determine how they can settle the issue quickly so a sewage program can be initiated."

Residents in the area now use septic tanks.

That's No Illusion, Drinker Discovers

JACKSON, Cal. — (U.P.) — Although William Hendley of Stockton, Cal., had one drink too many, he was perfectly right when he thought he saw 46 highway patrolmen bearing down on him.

After he had pleaded guilty to drunk driving and paid his $250 fine, he was informed he had driven his automobile into the midst of a convoy of rookie state highway patrolmen on a training cruise.
