

From Blue Cheese

MADISON, Wis. (U.P.) — Scientists at the University of Wisconsin have taken the green out of blue cheese.

They have discovered mutant forms of the roquefort-type mold without the characteristic green-mottled coloring. The bacteriologists say the green and white molds are the same but the white mold grows without adding extra iron to fresh milk used for the cheese.

They say tests show the white mutants make a satisfactory cheese and require only one-third to one-half the ripening time of the green mold.

my resolution

For the New Year is to sell every darn place listed exclusively for me within 30 days after I take the listing, (sooner than that in most cases). I came near doing that in 1951. But you may as well know, I am loyal to those who are loyal to me and you have to trust in my services exclusively. But of course why shouldn't you if you really want to sell & pay the commission.
