Women Doctors 'Here to Stay'

CHICAGO — (AP) — The woman doctor is here to stay, two female physicians have reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

They said women have found a definite place in medicine and are succeeding despite their sometimes dual role of doctor and mother.

The report was made by Drs. Hulda E. Thelander and Helen B. Weyrauch of San Francisco, who conducted a study of 230 women physicians—74 of them single and 156 married.

They said the woman doctor "works hard at being a good physician, and, by the selected standards, has succeeded."

The married woman doctor, they said, has done well despite several severe handicaps.

For one thing she may have the time-consuming job of raising children.

For another, she has to carve out a career where her husband is, rather than in a location where opportunities may be better. She also has to keep up with the latest medical knowledge while doing the housework.

The San Francisco doctors found that many of the female physicians go in for specialist work, such as pediatrics or obstetrics, but believed there is a larger place for them.

"In fact," they said, "all of medicine might gain materially from a feminine as well as a masculine point of view."

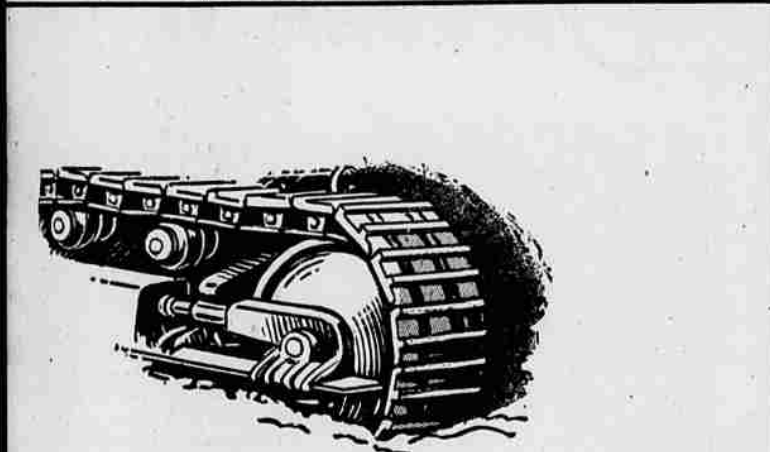

It appeared that the two points of view often merged.

Of the married women doctors surveyed, 79 of them married physicians.
