Eyewitness of Disaster Impressed By Stillness of Deathly Scene

The following eyewitness account of the train disaster which killed at least 82 persons at Harrow, Eng., was given to the Associated Press by Anthony V. Gregory, a professional portrait photographer living near the scene. The story may carry his byline.

By ANTHONY V. GREGORY
Written for the Associated Press
HARROW, Eng. (AP) — The people injured in this terrible crash seemed too stunned to make any noise.

Many were so motionless it was hard to tell the injured from the dead.

I lived 50 yards away from the scene of the three-train pile-up and was one of the first persons to arrive there.

What struck me immediately was how oddly quiet it was. There was a hiss of escaping steam and low moans from people trapped in the cars. But there were no outcries.

Soon the only sound you were aware of was the screech of ambulances arriving in relays to take away the injured and the chopping of firemen, policemen and rail-workers working quickly to free people trapped in the cars.

The injured were of all ages. They were brought out to the station platform, and finally a jumble of baggage was lined up there too.

There was no panic of any kind. Those who escaped injury did what they could for those who were hurt. Rescue workers offered one erect, elderly lady a cup of tea as she climbed out of a car.

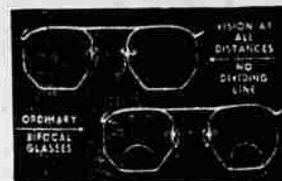

"I'm all right, thank you," she said. "There are many others in greater need of that than I am." There was a great confusion of wreckage. The engine of one train seemed to have jumped the platform and landed on a nearby line used by electric trains. It had disintegrated into just a shell.

I have a particularly vivid memory of the body of one woman, covered with a sheet and placed apart from the others. The rescuers were busy working to save the injured. The dead woman seemed so alone there.
