Hay, Pasture Needs Viewed

More pasture, silage and hay may be the big need in Oregon if farmers and ranchers are to take greatest advantage of increasing feed grain supplies, says M. D. Thomas, agricultural economist at Oregon State College.

In the latest "Agricultural Situation and Outlook" circular prepared at OSC, the economist explains that, in time, most of this grain will move to market through livestock. And most livestock requires forage in some form.

In the past, Oregon and the Northwest have been long on forage and short on feed grain, says Thomas. Now the balance is changing rapidly. Nearly 300,000 acres in Oregon and almost 900,000 additional acres in neighboring states that were producing wheat 2 years ago are now producing barley. Several thousand more acres are producing oats and corn. Similar increases in feed grain production are occurring in other Western states.

Meanwhile, Oregon's hay acreage has barely held its own and this year's acreage in the Northwest is expected to be less than 2 per cent larger than 2 years ago. Unless water supplies east of the Cascades turn out better than seem likely at present, Oregon probably will have one of the smallest hay crops on record.

At the same time, forage-consuming animals have been increasing while grain consumers have shown little change.

Breaking these figures down, the economist points out that in the season ahead, with an even break from the weather, there will be a supply of more than 1,800 pounds of feed grain per animal in the state. That is twice as much as 2 years ago. And there is plenty more in adjoining states, not to mention the surplus wheat crowding storage.

In contrast, the supply of hay in the year is not likely to exceed 2,800 pounds per unit of hay-eating livestock. That is about 400 pounds less than was available two years ago and 600 pounds less than the average.

Copies of the "Agricultural Situation and Outlook" circular are available from county extension offices and OSC.
