Extra Study Classes Set For Summer

A summer program for elementary and junior high school pupils who need extra study in reading, English and arithmetic will be offered at Adams School in Eugene.

Lloyd H. Gillett, director of education for the Eugene Public Schools, announced the following schedule:

Registration, 7 to 9 a.m. standard, 8 to 10 a.m. daylight, June 18. Classes will begin June 19. One class will begin at 7 a.m. standard, 8 a.m. daylight, and the second at 8:30 a.m. standard, 9:30 a.m. daylight.

Pupils from Grades 4-9 may take one or two classes, Gillett said. Second and third grade pupils may take reading only, selecting either of the two periods. Fees are $15 for each class.

Application forms are available at each elementary and junior high school. The forms may be sent to the Special Education Office, School Administration Building, 275 E. Seventh Ave., Eugene.

When It Gets to Legislature

Revision Plan Faces Battle

EDITOR'S NOTE—This is first of two stories summarizing the work of Oregon's Constitution Revision Commission, and outlining the problems ahead.

By PAUL W. HARVEY JR.
Of the Associated Press

SALEM—A 17-member commission wants to give Oregon's 103-year-old Constitution a major face-lifting job.

But even the members of the Constitution Revision Commission didn't have any illusions about whether the legislature will approve the commission's proposed new Constitution.

The commission has decided what should be in the new document, although it hasn't been drafted yet.

When it is submitted to the legislature next January, the lawmakers can make any changes they wish — and they undoubtedly will. Then, if the legislature wishes, it will send the Constitution to the state's voters on the 1964 ballot.

The legislature probably will run into a battle over the commission's theory that the governor should be much stronger, with many more powers.

The 1963 legislature refused Gov. Mark Hatfield's request that the governor be allowed to reorganize executive departments. The lawmakers just didn't want the governor to have any more power.

But the Constitution Revision Commission would go far beyond that. It would make the governor the one elected state official, with power to appoint heads of all executive departments, plus power to fire his appointees.

The commission believes the governor should be solely responsible for what happens in the executive branch.

The legislature would name a controller who would do the state's auditing.

The elective offices of secretary of state, treasurer, attorney general and labor commissioner would become appointive by the governor.

If the legislature refused to give the governor a little bit more power, it's hard to see how it would go whole hog on this question of a strong governor.

The commission points out that the United States gets along pretty well with a strong president who names his own cabinet, and says this system would work well in Oregon, too.

State Rep. George Layman, R-Newberg, chairman of the commission, says he hopes that the proposed Constitution won't become a political issue.

But once it gets into the legislature, politics will rear its head. The reason is that most Democrats like the strong governor idea, and most Republicans don't.

Hatfield's reorganization plan was beaten largely by members of his own Republican party. Gov. Hatfield long has favored a new constitution. We want
