

Uncle Sam to Help Put Idle Fathers Back to Work

By GEORGE J. MARDER
Of the United Press International
WASHINGTON — States and communities will soon be able to put unemployed fathers to work—courtesy of Uncle Sam.

And with Uncle Sam's pocket-book backing them up.
The new federal welfare law, effective with President Kennedy's signature, is aimed at encouraging communities to launch work and training programs for persons on relief. And Washington will pick up part of the tab for jobless fathers assigned to useful community work.

Heretofore, political subdivisions which wanted to put relief enrollees to work on community projects had to go it alone and pay for it themselves. The federal relief money available had to go to the recipients, with no strings attached.

The idea behind this was that

Construction to Begin

GUENZBURG, Germany (AP) Construction work on West Germany's first atomic power station is to start later this year, authorities in this Bavarian town said Saturday. Site of the power station is the nearby village of Gundremmingen on the River Danube.

the federal aid was not only a protection for the person on relief but also for the federal government in seeing to it that its welfare money was used for relief purposes and not to run some community project which normally would be undertaken anyway.

The curbs, however, led to charges that the government was encouraging relief loafers; that if people were being helped because they couldn't find private jobs, the least they could do was help out on community work.

The new law permits federal sharing in assistance payments to persons put to work on community projects. The emphasis will be on useful work and training programs to develop skills or to maintain the skills of people on relief.

Federal participation will be confined to the aid-for-dependent-children program. This essentially is aimed at jobless fathers because it is the only area of federal assistance where any sizeable jobless group able to work is involved.

The government does not have a general relief program of help for the poor but it does for specialized categories — the old, the blind, and the disabled who cannot work.

Then there is this category to aid families with dependent children. Until last year that aid was given only when the father was dead, disabled, or had deserted his family. But the law was changed so that aid to dependent children also went to families where the father was jobless, even though he was living at home.

This category, federal officials say, is the only one receiving federal help which has any sizeable group of men able to do work. In all, 56,400 were involved as of May, this year, the last month for which figures are available. But the figure is considered low because so few states have come under the program so far.

Fifteen states participated during the past year. This ratio is expected to increase, and some communities which have work programs, will be able to shift unemployed fathers from the local relief rolls to the federal-state rolls.
