Some light drizzle is likely in parts of the southern Plains. It will be warm along the immediate Atlantic Coast and in parts of the Southwest.

Election Oratory Echoes Across Piazzas

Red, Blue, Yellow Banners Fly Over Italian Streets

By EUGENE LEVIN
 Of the Associated Press
ROME — The din of election oratory echoes across thousands of Italian piazzas this weekend. "Our party is truly Catholic, vote for us," shouts the Fascist campaigner.
 "The Pope is for peace, so are we," cries the Communist. "A vote for us is a vote for a center-left government," says a Christian Democrat.
 Red, blue and yellow party banners hung across streets. Autos with loudspeakers cruised through residential areas. Campaign pamphlets littered sidewalks. For the first time in a parliamentary election, Italy's state Radio-TV network gave campaigners a chance to carry their pleas into the voters' homes.
 All campaigning must end Friday night. Then comes a day of silence reserved for quiet reflections before the two days of polling, April 28-29, that will decide whether the left-leaning government headed by Premier Amintore Fanfani is to survive.
 Old alignments and old themes have been upset by the unique nature of Fanfani's government, a coalition led by Christian Democrats and backed by Marxist Socialists. It has never been tested in a general election.
 Another new factor has been contacts between the Vatican and the Kremlin.
 The result is a confused campaign, with often three or more sides to every argument.
 Fanfani calls his government "an opening to the left." The Right-Fascists, Monarchists and Liberals—say it is really an "opening to communism." But the Communists say it is a phony leftist movement, a Christian Democrat deception. Fanfani says it meets Italy's problems and will isolate both leftist and rightist extremists.
 Rightists cite the dismantling of Jupiter missiles in Italy and say Fanfani is retreating from NATO commitments. Fanfani says NATO is simply modernizing; he pledges to back a NATO multi-nation nuclear strike force.

 The Communists contend Fanfani is quietly widening Italy's NATO commitments. They point to the "Pacem in Terris" (Peace on Earth) encyclical of Pope John XXIII, and say they—and not the Christian Democrats—have been the consistent supporters of disarmament and other measures advocated by the Pope.
 Rightists say they are the only true defenders of Roman Catholicism following Fanfani's deal with the Socialists. Fanfani and other Christian Democrats affirm they remain staunch Roman Catholics and note that the bishops of Italy have boosted their party.
 Even some leaders of the Christian Democrats speak with different voices.
 Fanfani, stumping the country from the Alps to Sicily, sometimes puts his government ahead of his Christian Democrat party. Once he told voters: "We invite old voters of the Christian Democrats, the Democratic Socialists and the Republicans to confirm full confidence in their parties. We invite old voters of the Socialists to encourage the directions their party has taken (away from communism)."
 It was a polite way of avoiding campaign conflict with the Democratic Socialists, Republicans and Socialists, all allies of his center-left government. They are not so polite. In separate campaigns they assail the Christian Democrats but avoid attacks on the government.
 Christian Democrat right-wingers, like former premier Mario Scelba, opposed Fanfani's leftist government. Fanfani suggests a vote for the Christian Democrats in a vote for center-left government. Scelba argues that the Christian Democrats can do without leftist coalitions—if they get enough votes.
 The Socialist party, which once walked hand in hand with communism, also has two separate campaign voices.
 Pietro Nenni, the Socialist leader, has an eye on a cabinet job. He once opposed NATO, but now says he sees no reason for Italy to pull out of the Atlantic alliance.
 The Liberals, a rightist free enterprise party, may attract dissident Christian Democrats. They say the denationalization of electric power would be their price for any future collaboration with the Christian Democrats.
 Italy has had right-leaning coalition governments of Christian Democrats and Liberals be-
