Enforcement

Former Tribune reporter Ben Jackett wrote, in the series of articles titled ‘The Secret Watchers,’ that law enforcement says that doesn’t happen anymore.

“But the spy files provide a cautionary tale in today’s post-Sept. 11 world. They show how intelligence gatherers can be seduced by their own political convictions. They show how watching one group leads to watching another, and then another. And they show how easy it is for secret files to take on a life of their own.”

The article continued: “People think surveillance will only be used against the bad people, but it never works like that,” says Ron Herndon, a longtime activist in Portland’s Black community who was spied on for years. “When you give law enforcement the unfettered authority to snoop into people’s lives in the name of national security, it will be abused.”

It may sound like a conspiracy theory to some people — but there’s no question that virtually every Oregon resident charged and convicted of terror-related crimes so far — and there are a surprising number — has been either Black, or Muslim, or both.

And certainly most of the 727 people currently listed on the Portland Police gang list are people of color.

RICO laws, as well as the Patriot Act, both involve significant degrees of surveillance, and wide swaths of secrecy in government operations.

“And you know as I remember them, there was a big wave when a lot of that RICO stuff first came out in the mid to late ‘90s, where the police did a whole sweep in Old Town-Chinatown with a bunch of young Black men, one of which was my cousin,” Muhammad said. “They were all secretly indicted for drug charges and then given some stiff sentences with regards to that.”

He notes that former Portland Police Officer Ron Frashour, who pulled the trigger that killed Aaron Campbell, is up for a new hearing next month in which he may be awarded his job back — one of many small factors that give community members the feeling that young Black men are the scapegoats of law enforcement, while police officers are not held accountable for wrongdoing.

Sen. Ron Wyden last week said it is important for local citizens to get behind gang prevention programs that stand to be cut in the federal budget.

“The last stop that we made last night in the community, I believe it was at the market at the corner of 18th and Dekum, and a fellow came up and he was wearing colors, and there wasn’t much question in my mind that he was a gang member,” Wyden said. “And he said, Senator, if you’re serious about getting at this you’ve got to reach the kids. You’ve got to reach the kids that are four, five, six, seven.

“He basically said because by the time they’re 10, you’re playing catch-up ball,” Wyden continued. “So in this community we’re going to have to marshal all our resources, federal, state, and local, to deal with this.”

One that’s on the federal chopping block is the Gang Resistance Education and Training Program, a model community policing institution that sends police officers into schools to work with young people and build positive relationships one-on-one.

GREAT also sponsors family events and parenting classes between law enforcement and immigrant Hispanic and Somali families in the Cully neighborhood.

The program’s total funding is being slashed from $25 million a few years ago to $10 million in next year’s budget.

Meanwhile, alleged Christmas bomber Mohamed Mohamud, who was born in Somalia, is scheduled for a ‘status and scheduling hearing’ May 23, after Judge Garr King in January rejected prosecutors’ efforts to schedule the teen’s terrorism trial for February of 2012.

Mohamud’s attorneys are expected to argue the former Oregon State University student was entrapped by FBI agents. He has pled not guilty in the case.
