

'Lettuce Grow' Brings Gardening Classes to Prisons

By Brian Stimson
Of The Skanner News

In seven Oregon state prisons, one job assignment has become an especially sought-after assignment. At one prison, you have to be all but a lifer to get on the team.

The prison garden, according to a number of program administrators around the state, has become a way for inmates to learn new skills, cooperate on a project and help feed themselves and their communities.

While there haven't been any studies completed on the effect the program has on recidivism or aggression, administrators say they see a difference in the attitudes of the inmate gardeners.

"It's been very positive," says Dale Ahlstrom, physical plant manager at Columbia River Correctional Institution.

For the last two years, the Lettuce Grow program has been a driving force behind seven prison gardens in the state of Oregon. In addition to finding donated seeds, soil amendments, and volunteers, program founder Sarah Patterson helped bring in a University Master Gardener class to each of the facilities.

More than 60 percent of the produce from gardens is used in the prison cafeteria. The rest is donated to the Oregon Food Bank.
