Street

Mi Lugo explains that when she sings, her songs are almost always improvised. She has phrases and lyrics that she uses but her songs fluctuate every time. This freestyle fashion makes her act that much more pure and passionate.

Her cost of production isn't much of a problem, she says that the strings on her violin have never broken and usually stays in tune. The only issue she runs into is when her globe breaks. Her constant use of the globe causes it to break or flatten on the top where she stands. She says that many of her friends have been replacing her globes.

Mi Lugo says that she hasn't had a lot of confrontations with the police. Street performing after all is such an accepted event in the city that often cops don't bother them at all. She says that little things like moving her tip case out of the way of people has been the only problem. But the main issue for cops, she explains, is the volume of the music and if passers-by complain of the noise. Mi Lugo's songs are generally soft and draw praise.

The money varies from day to day and it's never the same even if she goes to the same spots

She says that the money varies from day to day and it's never the same even if she goes to the same spots. Sometimes she goes home with very little money and sometimes with enough to pay the bills.

"I'm still struggling between doing it for money and doing it for love and mixing the two," Mi Lugo explains.

Besides performing as a job, Mi Lugo stresses that her main motivation for playing every day is to make a connection with her community through promoting music and art. She says that she likes performing for locals rather than tourists.

"I feel like the community is more receptive because they appreciate good music and art in their area, and tourists are looking more for something that they can take back with them," she adds.

Her favorite spot to play is the Mission District. She says that she loves the people there and can relate to the local artists and young crowd. You can catch her playing between 16th St. and Valencia.

Karla Mi Lugo

Mi Lugo's music hits just the right niche in San Francisco's multifarious art scene that is easily embraced and desired, and hopefully, is reflected by the amount of bills her violin case accumulates.

The genuine sentiments of a true musician are alive in Karla Mi Lugo and, as a hard working performer, she is a beautiful light in the shadow economy.
