Democrats Agree: Delay Education Payments to Fix Budget

By Mike Baker
The Associated Press

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) — Democratic leaders throughout the Legislature are pushing the delay of hundreds of million dollars in payments as a solution to the state's budget deficit, lawmakers said Tuesday.

Senate budget writers unveiled their spending plan Tuesday morning, relying on that $330 million accounting maneuver to help fix a $1 billion problem. The Senate proposes to make the delayed payments permanent, meaning school districts that typically get a major disbursement at the end of June will instead get it in early July.

The Senate plan is similar to a House proposal unveiled last week, which had about $400 million in delayed expenditures. Democratic Sen. Ed Murray said that shift in the calendar allowed lawmakers to avoid further cuts in education at a time when other legislators are looking at deeper reductions.

"This is a game-changer," Murray said. "We think part of the way of getting us out of this crisis is by funding, not cutting, education."

The spending proposal in the Senate would keep $370 million in reserves, less than the House plan that left a half billion dollars remaining.

Senate Majority Leader Lisa Brown said lawmakers hope to soon deal with structural problems within the budget.

"The underlying structural issue is not addressed in this budget," Brown said. "We feel the economic recovery is fairly tentative at this point, but we know we have to get to that eventually."

Brown said the state needs to have a larger discussion about tax revenue, noting that revenue as a percentage of personal income in the state has been on a long-term slide.
