PCC Cascade. People came and gave their feedback. So we've heard from people who have been advocates, who have pressured the system.

We've heard from people who have been hurt by police actions. We've heard from people actually on the COAB about their opinions of the report. We've heard from some of the public about that. We've heard from people who've been injured or harmed by the actions of the police.

The focus of the settlement agreement is on the treatment of people with mental illnesses. That doesn't leave anybody out. There are lots of different kinds of people who have mental health issues.

When you say working with people who have mental illnesses, you're talking about working with people who are Black, white, brown, disabled, gay, lesbian, straight, old, young, however long you want to make the list.

Any of us – any of us – can suffer from a mental illness. And it's hard for us sometimes to stay on track when a lot of what we see on the TV right now is about white policemen and Black young people.

TSN: That's one of the things that makes the DOJ settlement in Portland unique. And Portland's not the only city, but it is one of the cities where mental illness, rather than race, was singled out as the factor that was of concern to the DOJ.

KS: We're the only city with a COAB. We're the only city with a Community Oversight Advisory Board.

TSN: Have you worked in situations where you've had the chance to interface with community groups, open forums like this before?

KS: That's what I've done a lot of my life. I've facilitated them, I've been participants in them, I've helped to put them together.

TSN: How do groups like that work when they work well? How does that process work when it works well?

KS: It works best when you are clear on the purpose of the gathering. It works best when you are clear on how you expect people to treat one another. It works best when you make sure the people that are giving information have good information and know why they're giving it, and know what they want out of the event. If you don't know why you're doing it, it's messy, because you can't give any direction or focus or weight. You have to know why you're pulling people into the room. We're pulling them into the room because we want to hear from them about the settlement agreement. We're not handling individual cases. We're looking at systemic change, institutional change.

TSN: What are the other things the public should know about this process?

KS: What the public needs to know is that it has a role in it that is, at its core, one of the most important things about this process, is that the public has a role. They also need to know that it's the first in the country. It's an experiment and it's an opportunity to be involved in changing something that we all care about. The public also needs to know that the city of Portland, the Department of Justice, the Portland Police Bureau are just three-fourths of what it takes. The fourth fourth is the community. The leadership up to this point, the diligence, the tenacity, the refusal to give up is admirable. There are lots of people, including the Albina Ministerial Alliance, who have seen to it that this has continuously gone forward. They need to be congratulated for bringing us this far, for bringing us here and continuing on.
