KW: Was there a meaningful spiritual component to Jordan’s childhood?

LM: Very much so. He was very heavily involved in his youth group. He would go on the spiritual retreats our church would have for the children. And when he was very young, I was a flight attendant, and my church family and other single-moms would come together and take care of him if I had to work, so he wouldn’t miss a beat. He was very enthusiastic about attending the children’s service. He would scream, “Come on, Mom, I don’t want to be late.” I was just so happy that, at an early age, he had found God for himself, and had his own personal relationship with God.

KW: Editor/Legist Patricia Turnier asks: What message do you want people to take away from 3½ Minutes, Ten Bullets?

LM: I want people to think about more than just themselves. I want them to think about what’s happening in the country, dynamically, in terms of racism and fear and guns and violence. And if you don’t condone what’s going on, I’d like you to ask yourself what you’re going to do about it. In what small way can you contribute to make sure everyone’s human and civil rights are respected. We all have a responsibility to be each other’s keepers. If we don’t, we’re going to begin to fall as a nation, and you’ll see us completely begin to dismantle ourselves.

KW: Patricia also asks: What do you think should be done regarding gun control laws to make sure that weapons do not get into the hands of the wrong people?

LM: Because of the black market, I realize we’re not going to be able to take all the guns off the street. But that doesn’t mean that we can’t work with our legislators to change the laws so that they’re not so expansive and allow people to use their guns any way they want to as vigilantes and self-appointed sheriffs.

KW: Why do you think Michael Dunn was convicted, while George Zimmerman was found not guilty in the death of Trayvon Martin?

LM: I think the problem with Trayvon’s case was that he was demonized from the very beginning. And because he was dead, there was no one to refute what the shooter said. In our case, we had his friends and other witnesses who could testify. And if it weren’t for a stranger, Sean Atkins, who reported Michael Dunn’s license plate before he fled the scene, he might never have even been arrested.
